JOHN S. WURTS, ESQ.

1876–1958

Lawyer, author, editor, born in Pennsylvania of English Pilgrim and Puritan, Swiss Calvinist, Holland Waldensian, Welsh Quaker, French Huguenot, Swedish Lutheran, and Scotch Covenanter ancestry, the son of Theodore F. Wurts, eminent civil engineer, and his wife, Anna Vanuxem. A representative of the twelfth generation in America, of ministers and elders, his ancestors were among the settlers in eleven of the thirteen original States. He married Dorothy Barrett Williams and they are the parents of two daughters and two sons.

He was educated at the West Jersey Military Academy and the University of Pennsylvania Law School. He was a member of the Philadelphia Bar, and of the Bar of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and was admitted also to practice in the Supreme Court of the United States. He was appointed Commissioner for all States of the Union and Puerto Rico. He was a member of the Philadelphia Bar Association who, in 1954, awarded him a "Certificate of Commendation," signalizing "fifty years of devoted service as a Philadelphia lawyer."

Sympathetic to human need, he actively served his own locality in Gospel Rescue Missions, Relief Societies, care of the Aged, and local reform politics. He was a Ruling Elder in the Presbyterian Church and for many years a Sunday School Superintendent, active in the Philadelphia Sunday School Association, and on the Executive Committee, Pennsylvania State Y.M.C.A. In 1907, with Rev. Robert G. Boville and Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins, he was a founder of the Daily Vacation Bible School Movement in Philadelphia. He served as President of the Philadelphia Association; President of the World Association of the Daily Vacation Bible Schools; and was founder of the Daily Vacation Bible Schools Foundation.

He was widely known as the author of various religious, historical and genealogical publications, among which are: The Life of Judge Henry Wynkoop, The Christian Faith, The Grandin Genealogy, The Romance of the Magna Charta, and Wurts' Magna Charta Series.

As a noted genealogist, he valued his memberships in various patriotic Societies,—the Society of Colonial Wars, the Colonial Society of Pennsylvania, the Pennsylvania Society Sons of the Revolution, the Society of the War of 1812, the Welsh Society, St. Andrew's Society, The Plantagenet Society, the Baronial Order of Runnemede, The Colonial Order of the Crown, the Order of Washington, Sovereign Colonial Society Americans of Royal Descent, Descendants of the Continental Congress, the Loyal Legion, Society of Descendants of Knights of the Garter. He served as the Chancellor of The National Society Magna Charta Dames, and of kindred Old World Hereditary Orders. At the request of the Duke of Somerset, he served as Treasurer of the Restoration Fund of St. George's Chapel, the Shrine of the Knights of the Garter at Windsor Castle. He labored faithfully to further the influence of Christian civilization and to preserve its liberties.

PREFACE

Anatole France opened one of his books with the remark that every living person is ruled throughout his life by untold numbers of the dead, a solemn rebuke to those who look with contempt on all studies dealing with the past. We are seldom aware of the number of these predecessors. When there are only daughters in the family, marriage cancels out the family name, or the name dies with the lady. It is seldom indeed that we find a continued male succession of any length. The most notable line of this sort was that of the de Vere family. Edward de Vere was the Eighteenth Earl of Oxford, and one of those cited as the true author of Shakespeare's plays. An old portrait of Shakespeare, under infra-red examination, shows a pendant at the wearer's throat, which some say is the de Vere emblem, a boar (verre in Old French) which is the meaning of the name. The Earldom of the de Veres ended in 1703, but that was still more than two hundred years ago.

Old family histories are connected with fantastic stories, and it is disappointing that we cannot give space to more than the supposed connection of Robert FitzWalter with the Robin Hood legend, and King John's alleged associations with "Maid Marian." Eleanor of Aquitaine was supposed to have been a witch. When forced to stay throughout the sacring of the Mass, her horror at being present caused the church to be filled with thick black smoke. There was a flash and a rumble, and upon the dispersal of the smoke a broken clerestory window was found, indicating the queen's hasty upward retreat. In her panic she had pulled Prince John along by the hand, but dropped him in her ascent to the window. His fall apparently was intended to account for a life-long limp. His ancestor, the Black Fulke, is said to have harnessed and ridden his son like a beast of burden to show him who was master. And Richard the Lion-Hearted met his death, either at the hands of hashish-maddened soldiers sent out in search of him by the Old Man of the Mountains (a Turkish legendary character whose hashish-fed hordes give us the present-day word assassin) with whom Richard had contested for the favors of the Princess Jeanne; or, he died of an infected arrow wound, which he got for his inattention, for his eyes were fixed on the battlements of one of his French castles where a madman, armed only with a frying pan and an empty bow, stopped the arrows with the skillet and sent them flying back to the archers. Rather than condemn the man for shooting him, Richard rewarded him handsomely for his ingenuity. Perhaps Richard was prepared for out-of-the-way happenings, for all this occurred in an out-of-the-way war. The fighting started when it was discovered that a collection of life-size figures of solid gold had been buried in the castle grounds.

Such tales were invented to build up the ferocity of the Angevins in later years, or as a nationalistic measure, to make superheroes of the Plantagenets. Maud of Eu, the Lusignan heiress who married into the Bohun family, doubtless brought as part of her dower the romance of her ancestor who discovered that his lovely wife, Melusine, retired to a private bath chamber each Friday night and there remained as a serpent until Monday morning every week in the year. When the discovery was made and Melusine learned of her husband's spying, she took flight from the window in serpent form, leaving a footprint on the sill.

None of these tales is true, and those that sound the most plausible cannot be proved. Often they are palace gossip of scandal and intrigue. Too often lurid sins were listed in histories by chroniclers of the opposing party. The Reverend William Betham, the genealogist, says that genealogies and accompanying tales were written because > ". . . family vied with family, which should produce the greatest number of heroes and other worthies. This was their incentive to magnanimity, hospitality and many other virtues they possessed. This thirst after family renown it was, together with the reflection on the example of their ancestors, that animated them in their bitterest conflict and occasioned them to meet death rather with transport than reluctance. The histories of many noble families will sufficiently verify this assertion . . ."

Genealogy was important in the Middle Ages for, in a feudal society, the apportioning of land is the foremost concern of a family, and the establishment of a direct heir who will inherit his father's manor and his mother's dower. Men are the inheritors, and more attention is given to their vital statistics. Death dates are to be found in Wills, land grants, patent and pipe rolls and, of course, on tombs. They are to be found in parish records, as are dates of christening. Birth dates are not so easy to determine. Many parish records have mouldered, have been lost or destroyed over the years. Births were not accounted for systematically until the Nineteenth Century. It has become legally necessary to so record them now, and we have come to accept them as a matter of course; but this is a relatively recent measure. At a trial Geoffrey Chaucer testified to his age as "forty on and upward." No one less than a King in Chaucer's day could estimate his own age with any exactitude. True, christenings were recorded, but their timing might, for siege, bad weather, illness, or other mishap, occur from a week to a few months after the birth. Women's birth dates are notoriously unsure. All this is lamentable, for proper dates fix the succeeding generations in order.

Inconsistency and variance in detail are present in modern pedigrees too, causing versions of the same ancestry to differ. Often original records are lost or are not available. For these reasons we hesitate to state the degree of accuracy of some pedigrees. But even if a pedigree does not command all the genealogist's faith, we have at least an impressionistic picture, — and once again we go back to

> " . . . beauty making beautiful old rhyme,
> In praise of ladies dead, and lovely knights."

GLOSSARY OF MEDIEVAL MILITARY ARCHITECTURE

Adytum ..... a chancel, sanctum, holy of holies
Bailey ..... the outer wall of a feudal castle or fortress
Barbican ..... a tower or advance work defending the entrance way
Bastion ..... a projection from a main enclosure situated so as to afford defense for the adjacent curtain
Battlement ..... a parapet consisting of alternate solid and open spaces
Buttress ..... a projecting mass of masonry, used for resisting the thrust of an arch
Corbel ..... a bracket supporting a parapet, beam or the spring of an arch
Crenelle ..... an indentation in a battlement, a loophole in a fortress
Curtain ..... that part of a rampart and parapet between two bastions
Donjon ..... chief tower, a massive tower, the strongest unit in a fortress
Enciente ..... a line of works forming the main enclosure
Escalade ..... an attack in which ladders are used
Escarpment ..... ground cut away vertically to prevent hostile approach
Fosse ..... a ditch or moat
Herringbone masonry ..... masonry in which courses of brick and stone are laid diagonally with binding courses above and below, a style of reinforcement found in early Byzantine walls in Asia Minor, a decorative motif used in Byzantine churches
Keep ..... the donjon, the strongest part of the castle, the lord's living quarters
Machicolation ..... an opening between corbels supporting a parapet, or in the floor of a gallery, or above a portal for the dropping or firing of missiles upon assailants below
Merlons ..... the solid portions of a battlement
Mining ..... burrowing under the walls in order to set fire to supporting timber
Moat ..... a surrounding trench filled with water
Motte ..... a hill made of earth thrown out of a trench, the elevated foundation of a castle
Mount, mound ..... a mound within a fortified enclosure where the lord originally held court, later a place raised as a rostrum from which commanding officers might issue orders; sometimes an eminence upon which sentences were pronounced and often executed
Perpendicular ..... in architecture; the latest variety of English gothic, deriving its name from the vertical lines in the mullioned windows
Postern ..... a subterranean passage communicating between the parade and moat
Purbeck ..... of stone; a limestone of the oolitic stratum found at Purbeck, England, near the coast of Dorsetshire (vicinity of Corfe Castle)
Rampart ..... a broad embankment of earth supporting the parapet or castle wall
Sapping ..... undermining, removing or damaging the foundations
Scarp v. (escarp) ..... to cut down perpendicularly
Shell ..... towers and works forming an enclosure
Shell keep ..... a roofless keep, an open tower forming an enclosure
Ward ..... one of several high towers suitable for the station of a lookout

ARUNDEL CASTLE

CHAPTER 262

The Sureties for Magna Charta and their Castles

When William the Conqueror invaded England he ordered the construction of castles in order to stamp out any incipient revolt. He also rebuilt castles already in existence. It will be seen, in a survey of the map, that most of these castles were built on the sites of Roman fortifications, using the hills and river junctions that the Romans had chosen as natural defense. William seems to have parcelled out a number of these castles to his most faithful followers, and their direct descendants were Magna Charta Barons.

In Northumberland, that "debatable land" of constant cattle raids, villages were huddled around single tower fastnesses called pele towers, or were jostled between the walls of a fortress. Here Mowbray, FitzRobert, Vesci and Percy were the most powerful names. Cheshire, looking to Wales for outcropping violence, seemed to be under the sole control of the Lacie family. Pembrokeshire flaunted the names of Clare and Marshall as protection from Danish raids from Ireland. And the house of Malet reigned supreme over Somersetshire, as the Mowbray influence held the border-shire and outposts in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire.

As an example of the Norman tendency to follow the pattern set by the Roman strategists, we note a concentration of castles in Yorkshire, not too far distant from the coast. If a line were to be drawn past the inland fortresses in this group from Barnard Castle to York, we would find that the line parallels a Roman road. It would seem that this area had been heavily fortified by the Romans, perhaps to protect baggage trains from raiding Picts coming from Scotland, possibly before the completion of Hadrian's Wall. We may note that the Wall follows the course of the Tyne River. At the extreme East is Mowbray's New-Castle-upon-Tyne, balanced at the extreme West by Carlisle Castle of the Roos family.

Yorkshire, largely patrolled by the Mowbrays, was heavily fortified against the Scots and the Danes, who had established a foothold in Scotland and along the coast of Northumberland. In Northumberland two strongholds belonging to the Vescis and the family of John FitzRobert, submitted to William the Lion. He, in turn, was vanquished and marched through the gates of Newcastle.

Nottingham has been called the Key to the North, but Nottingham Castle and the houses of the neighboring Barons were farther to the South. It would seem that perhaps the cluster of castles here was indicative of a coalition with the Bishop of Lincoln, a strong ecclesiastical figure. To the extreme South, around the mouth of the Thames, there is a large group of huge castles owned by the King and the most powerful Barons. These are situated close to the Royal Court and the See of Canterbury. Farther from Canterbury the Barons were not so directly influenced by the King, but they were close to the local Archbishop. Church and State were one, and medieval bishops were also powerful landowning lords. At the mouth of the Thames the castles were Royal strongholds which could be banded together in coordinated plans to help the Crown. They were also stationed as a defense against any menace from the Continent. The Nottingham area, with its castles on rivers, must have been a defense for the Eastern shore. At the head of the Wash was the fen country, and the nearest one could get to solid ground near the coast would be Leicestershire or Rutland. In the North the Barons rallied around York and her Archbishop, and short of the Welsh mountains, Southward along the inland Welsh border, the Lacies built their castles to keep the Britons back in their wild country. William Marshall, from time to time, held the Pembrokeshire castles at the end of the Welsh peninsula, all of them built on Roman sites, for they had been used by the Romans as a defense against the Danes.

As we look at the map, we see how the Barons' War was chiefly fought in the Southern region. Here the castles were near enough to the Royal headquarters to make it possible for the King to be present at the various sieges. Here the castles had been Royal property, and were the heaviest fortifications near the King, Canterbury and the navigable Thames. Here were the great strongholds held, or to be held in the Barons' War, by Roger Bigod, Robert de Vere, Saire de Quincey, Robert FitzWalter, William d'Albini and William de Huntingfield. And here, also, were convenient landing places for the Dauphin.

CAERNARVON CASTLE

The earliest castles of Normandy and England were not massive stone donjons. Most of them were built of wood and surrounded by a stockade, which in turn surrounded an artificial mound or motte, built from the earth dug out of the moat. Over the moat was a drawbridge, cleated to keep the horses from slipping. It led from the farther side of the moat to the second story of the tower, for the ground floor was used only for storage and as a prison.

Nothing is now left of such fortresses beyond the outlines of their mounds and moats. These great block houses could offer resistance to battering rams, but the danger of fire was great, and during the 12th Century they were replaced with stone. Square towers still survive, likewise the earliest examples of the round keeps and the square keeps flanked with round towers.

The donjon was built more for strength than for comfort, and those who lived in it considered their dwelling a defense rather than a home. Space was constricted. Windows were few and small. Sometimes there would be only a single window and a single room to each story. Trap doors and ladders connected the various levels. Fires were not used in wooden castles. Although the donjon was primarily military in design, it would nevertheless be the permanent residence of a nobleman in the 11th or 12th Century. It is only at the end of this period that other buildings were developed to provide more room and convenience, as the standards of comfort rose.

By the time of William the Conqueror, definite restrictions had been placed on the creation of these centers of force. Without a Duke's license a castle could not be erected, nor could one fortify a rock or island, nor could one dig a fosse so deep that machinery would be required to throw the earth out from the bottom. The Duke had the right to install garrisons in his Barons' castles, and to demand hostages for their loyalty.

Castles usually consisted of three divisions: The inner and outer courts and the keep, which served as living quarters. The barbican guarded the entrance and served as a supplementary gateway in from the main gate. The passage to the gateway could be blocked by the gate and by the spiked iron grating of the portcullis. The archway was pierced with holes, machicolations which could be used to pour molten, boiling lead upon the enemy.

The strongholds existing at the time of the Norman Conquest offered little resistance to William. In order to maintain his position, once he had established it, he proceeded to build castles all over the Kingdom and to repair the old ones. He had parcelled out land among his followers and they, well aware of the fury of the despoiled natives, built fortresses on their estates. Castle building soon became so rife that, in the reign of Stephen, "adulterine" or unauthorized castles soon amounted to 1,115 in all.

When, much later, King John wished to repudiate the newly granted Magna Charta, he set about preparing the Royal castles against attack and planned to make them his centers of resistance. The Barons began the revolt by besieging Northampton and, close upon that, Oxford. They seized Rochester, which the King took back after a severe struggle, and captured Tonbridge.

Let us then run through a brief accounting of the feudal headquarters of some of the Magna Charta Barons. A number of them have been badly damaged. Some have disappeared entirely. Often we can learn of them through Medieval and Renaissance accounts, and some of them require the discerning eye of the archeologist. Others await the evidence brought out with a shovel and pick, by the trained archeological historian.

ALBINI

The seat of WILLIAM d'ALBINI, the Surety, was Belvoir Castle (pronounced "Bee-voor") founded in 1088 by Robert de Todeni, or Toni. D'Albini succeeded to the Castle in 1167/8. It needed no artificial motte, for it was built on a steep and isolated hill. Apparently there was once a fine shell wall, but the builders of the present mansion have ruined the earthworks left after King John destroyed the Castle. Apparently John left it a ruin. It has been recently the seat of the Duke of Rutland. When Thomas Murphy described it, he said: "Standing on a rising hill its many towers and battlements looking over the forests surrounding it, the vast pile more nearly fulfilled our ideas of feudal magnificence than any other we saw." He was sadly mistaken. The building he saw was a modern Gothic structure, built by Wyatt in 1808, for all that had remained of the original Norman structure was destroyed by fire in the late 18th Century.

But the scene of William d'Albini's struggle with King John was the lowering Castle of Rochester. It was situated on the great Northwest Southeast Road built by the Romans and known to later Englishmen as Watling Street. It was well guarded, on one side by the swirling waters of the Medway, and on the other three by a curtain wall. The lost Belvoir was centrally located in Leistershire, but Rochester was in the South, close to the Royal palace. Numerous coins found near Rochester Castle show that it was built on the site of a Roman ruin, but there are no Roman walls to be found.

Only the keep remains, but it can be seen from a distance of twenty miles. Some claim that the Castle was originally built by Odo of Bayeux, and used as a threat to William Rufus. Others claim that the construction was ordered by William the Conqueror. The structure we now see was commenced by Bishop Gundulf, and on the site of the Bishop's earlier tower a castle was completed before 1139, under the orders of William de Corbeuil. The keep might date to approximately 1130, and the cell under the wall of one of the towers has suffered few alterations since that time.

While William d'Albini held the Castle against King John and his army of mercenaries, the King appeared on the scene in person. The siege continued for seven weeks. The outer wall had been badly damaged and the soldiers had resorted to the keep. But when John's soldiers made a breach in the wall and attempted to enter, they were promptly repelled. The siege continued, and finally hunger and thirst forced a surrender. All d'Albini's men were killed. Their leader was spared, but he had to spend a long time in a medieval prison and was heavily fined.

In 1216 the Dauphin took Rochester Castle and all Kent submitted to him as overlord. Now the walls are standing. The masonry of the keep is firm, but the interior has long since been destroyed.

William d'Albini, the Surety, was the third Baron of his family.

When his father died he was in ward to King Henry II and, in 1194, he was in the army of Richard I in Normandy. Already a wealthy man at the time of the accession of John to the throne, he received several additional grants of great value. In 1201, when the Barons refused to follow their Sovereign into France, King John demanded that their castles should be given up to him as security for their allegiance, beginning with William d'Albini; and therewith Belvoir Castle, instead of which d'Albini gave him his son, William, as a hostage.

He appears to have remained longer faithful to King John, as well as more moderate in his opposition to the King than most of the Barons, and he did not join the insurgents until he could no longer with safety remain neutral or adhere to the King for, as late as January 1214/5, he was one of King John's commissioners appointed for the safe conduct of such as were traveling to his Court at Northampton.

After he joined the Baron's party, d'Albini entered with great spirit into their cause and was excommunicated but, after having gained their point, he was looked upon with suspicion by the other Sureties, because he did not attend the grand tournament in Staine's Wood on 29 June 1215, to celebrate the victory. It was not until after other Barons had alarmed him that he fortified his Castle at Belvoir and joined them at London. But the sequel proves that their suspicions were not well grounded. He was placed as governor of Rochester Castle when, though he found it so utterly destitute of provisions as almost to induce his men to abandon it, he recruited and held it until weakness and famine obliged them to surrender to the King. The siege lasted three months and his army suffered considerable loss. King John ordered that all nobles in the Castle be hanged, but his chief counsellers resolutely opposed this sentence and William d'Albini and his son, Odonel, with several other Barons, were merely committed to the custody of Peter de Mauley, and sent as prisoners to Corfe and Nottingham Castles.

While d'Albini remained at Corfe, the King marched, on Christmas morning 1216, from Nottingham to Langar near Belvoir Castle, and sent a summons to surrender. Upon this, Nicholas d'Albini, one of the Baron's sons and a Clerk in Orders, delivered the keys to the King, asking only that his father should be mercifully treated. The fortress was then committed to the custody of Geoffrey and Oliver de Buteville. William's liberty was gained by paying to the King a fine of 6,000 marks (more than 4,000 pounds) and the sum was raised from his own lands by his wife. After King John's death, though he submitted himself to King Henry III, William d'Albini was forced to give his wife and son Nicholas as hostages for his allegiance, but in 1217 he was one of the King's commanders at the Battle of Lincoln. He died at Offington 1 May 1236, and his body was buried in Newstead, and "his heart under the wall opposite the high altar" at Belvoir Castle.

William d'Albini was one of the King's foremost financial officers. Before 1200 he had been custodian sheriff, a sort of tax collector and treasurer combined. After 1200 King John appointed him one of the justices or "exchequers" of the Jews. As such he kept a record of all royal debts to Jews, and of payments made to them. Possibly such an official settled disputes connected with money-lending operations. The Jews were a powerful source of revenue, which the King desired to protect to his own interest. From Michaelmas 1210 to mid-Lent of 1211, William and five other Barons were in charge of customs duties on dyes and grain. In 1213 we find him involved in a baronial investigation committee, which sought to unearth evidence of alleged embezzlements charged to certain sheriffs.

BIGOD

Bigod is the name associated with Framlingham Castle in Suffolk. It is an imposing structure. The outer walls are forty-four feet high and eight feet thick. Thirteen towers fifty-eight feet in height remain, along with a gateway and some outworks. In early Roman times it was probably the site of the fortified earthwork that sheltered Saint Edmund when he fled from the Danes in 870, but we cannot be sure of the authenticity of this tradition. The Danes seized the fort, but they lost it in 921; it then remained a Crown possession, which passed into the hands of William the Conqueror when he became King. In 1100 Henry I granted the Castle to Roger Bigod, and possibly Roger was the one to erect the first masonry building.

The ruins indicate a 12th Century dating, though material from an older building may very well have been used in the walls. Evidently the Castle was completely rebuilt in 1170. It remained in the Bigod family for some generations, then passed into the hands of the Mowbrays.

ROGER BIGOD, the Surety, was born about 1150 and succeeded as second Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk. It is fitting that, after Richard's return to England after his captivity in Germany, Roger Bigod was chosen to be one of the four Earls who carried the silken canopy for the King, as Hugh Bigod had borne the Royal sceptre in the Royal procession.

Roger Bigod was appointed in 1189 by King Richard one of the Ambassadors to King Philip of France, to obtain aid for the recovery of the Holy Land. In 1191 he was keeper of Hereford Castle. He was chief judge in the King's Court from 1195 to 1202. In 1200 he was sent by King John as one of his messengers to summon William the Lion, King of Scotland, to do homage to him in the Parliament which was held at Lincoln, and subsequently attended King John into Poitou; but on his return he was won over to the opposition by the rebel Barons and became one of the strongest advocates of the Charter of Liberty, for which he was excommunicated by Pope Innocent III. He died before August 1221, having married as his first wife, Isabella, daughter of Hameline Plantagenet, who was descended from the Earls of Warren.

HUGH BIGOD, son of the preceding Surety and himself a Surety, was third Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, and heir to his father's estates and honors, to which he had succeeded in the 5th of King Henry III. He died four years later, in February 1224/5, having married about 1212 Maud, a sister of the Surety William Marshall, and eldest daughter of William Marshall, the Protector. In her right Hugh acquired the Earldom of Pembroke, in which rank William Marshall bore the Royal Sceptre at the Coronation of King Richard I.

BOHUN

HENRY de BOHUN, the Surety, was born before 1177. He became the first Earl of Hereford of this family, for he was so created by the Charter of King John, dated 28 April 1199. Even though he took the Barons' side against the King, on becoming Earl of Hereford he had promised that he would never make any claim against John or his heirs, on the basis of a Charter given to his great uncle Roger by Henry II. The office of Lord High Constable of England he inherited from his father, but he seems to have played no other active part in John's government. As he took a prominent part with the Barons against King John, his lands were confiscated, but he received them again at the granting of Magna Charta. Having been excommunicated along with the other Barons, he did not return to his allegiance on the decease of King John, but became one of the commanders in the Army of Louis the Dauphin, at the Battle of Lincoln, and was taken prisoner by William Marshall. After this defeat he joined Saire de Quincey and other Magna Charta Barons in a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1220, and died on the passage 1 June 1220. His body was brought home and buried in the chapter-house of Llanthony Abbey in Gloucestershire.

His wife, Maud FitzGeoffrey, was the daughter of Geoffrey Fitz-Piers, Baron de Mandeville, and his first wife, Beatrix Saye.

The name of Bohun suggests Hereford. Unfortunately, Hereford Castle no longer exists. It was built in 1048, and apparently consisted of a moat and bailey. The mound has been leveled to the ground, but the bailey is outlined by high banks. One report has it that all that remains is a platform and a piece of a ditch.

The Castle was once situated near the present Bishop's Palace. It was seriously battered in an attack in 1055, but it was restored, and was again in use in 1067. The site which it now occupies is a public garden, gay with shrubbery and flowers. An ornamental lake indicates where once was the moat, but the outlines of the walls are shown only by grass covered ridges.

CLARE

As for the Hertford Castle of the de Clares, it is one of two Castles: A 10th Century ruin or a 17th Century structure. The older Castle retains a wall and part of a Norman tower. The remainder of the building is a Jacobean accretion made of brick and completely modernized.

Gilbert de Clare built a Castle at Caerdigan, Pembrokeshire, Wales. A marriage brought it into the hands of William Marshall, who soon controlled the strongest castles on the peninsula. The keep has been transformed into a modern house. Of all the castles that finally came into William Marshall's possession, this was the most important to the area. Scholars believe there is evidence that it was originally built of wood.

RICHARD de CLARE, the Surety, was the fourth Earl of Hertford but, like his father and uncle, was more generally known as Earl of Clare. He was present at the Coronation of King Richard I at Westminster, 3 September 1189, and of King John, 27 May 1199. He sided with the Barons against King John, and his Castle at Tonbridge was taken. On 9 November 1215 he was one of the commissioners who, on the part of the Barons, was to treat of peace with the King. On 4 March 1215/6 his lands in counties Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk and Essex were granted to Robert de Betun; he and his son were among the Barons excommunicated by the Pope in 1215. He died between 3 October and 28 November 1217. He married Amicia, Countess of Gloucester, second daughter of William FitzRobert, Earl of Gloucester, and his wife, Hawise, daughter of Robert de Beaumont, Earl of Leicester. She died 1 January 1224/5.

GILBERT de CLARE, himself a Surety, and son of Richard de Clare, the preceding Surety, was born about the year 1180. In June 1202 he was entrusted with the lands of Harfleur and Mostrevilliers. He was one of the Barons still opposing the arbitrary proceedings of the Crown. He championed Louis the Dauphin, fighting at Lincoln under the Baronial banner, and was taken prisoner by William Marshall, whose daughter he later married. He led an army against the Welsh in 1228 and captured Morgan Gam, who was released the next year. After an engagement in Brittany, he died on his return at Penros in that Duchy, 25 October 1230. His body was conveyed by way of Plymouth and Cranbourn to Tewkesbury. He was buried there before the High Altar 10 November 1230. He married Isabella, sister of William Marshall, the Surety, and daughter of William Marshall, the Protector, on 9 October 1217. She died 17 January 1239/40.

FITZROBERT

JOHN FITZROBERT, the Surety, married Ada Baliol, and in her right became lord of Barnard Castle, whose founder was Barnard Baliol. The Castle is now a scanty ruin, but the remaining walls stand high on a cliff scarped, so that wall and bank are one, dropping down to the River Tees. The Castle looms over the town, and may be approached through a gate in the yard of the King's Head Inn.

The date of the Castle's founding is between 1112 and 1132. The keep, known as Baliol's Tower, stands fifty feet high and served as a background for Sir Walter Scott's Rokeby. The surrounding property extends over six acres.

This same Surety, FitzRobert, was also lord of the handsome Warkworth Castle in the border country of Northumberland. It is an excellently preserved fortress built, at the earliest, in the 12th Century. It is situated near the mouth of the Coquet River. One approaches it from a double arched bridge and finds that it is bounded on three sides by water. The walls, gateway and Great Hall are intact, as are the Lion Tower of the 13th Century and the 14th Century keep. Robert FitzRichard probably added to it in Henry II's reign. It became the property of the Percy family in the reign of Edward III, and is now held by the Dukes of Northumberland.

When the Barons met at Saint Edmondsbury, John FitzRobert, the Surety, was still loyal to King John and was, with John Marshall, joint governor of the Castles of Norwich and Oxford. Subsequently he joined the insurrection, and took such a prominent part that his lands were seized by the King. He returned allegiance in the next reign, his Castles and vast estates were returned to him, and he was constituted high sheriff of co. Northumberland and governor of New-Castle-upon-Tyne. He died in 1240, the same year as his father. The monk, Matthew Paris, records: "In this year died John FitzRobert, a man of noble birth, and one of the chief Barons of the Northern provinces of England."

FITZWALTER

ROBERT FITZWALTER, the Surety, was third lord of Dunmow Castle and leader of the Magna Charta Barons and their Army, styled "Marshal of the Army of God and the Holy Church." The first public act recorded of this subsequently important Baron and standard bearer of the City of London conveys at first a bad impression of him. It is recorded that "in 5th John 1203 Robert FitzWalter, being trusted, together with Saire de Quincey, also a Surety, to keep the Castle of Ruil in France, delivered it up to the King of that realm as soon as he came before it with an army." This appears to imply a measure of cowardice rather than disloyalty, but a short time proved to which of these motives the deed was to be ascribed. There was a possibility that FitzWalter and Quincey surrendered the Castle for a false bribe from Philip. It is also likely that the two were involved in a general Baronial conspiracy against John, knowing that he would have to be lenient with them. In 1212 John was being unusually careful about the use of the exchequer seal, possibly fearing Baronial plotting (that a wrong use would be made of the seal privately) for Canons of St. Paul's, intimates of exchequer officials, were known to be involved in FitzWalter's conspiracy. There is also controversy over FitzWalter's later hasty departure for France. Whether it was because of John's alleged seduction of Robert's daughter or his refusal to live under the reign of an excommunicate King, we cannot say.

At the time the Barons, at home and abroad, were preparing to compel King John to keep his promises in the matter of the proposed statutes, several conspiracies to this end were discovered, wherein Robert FitzWalter was materially concerned. On the discovery of his "treasonable practices," FitzWalter, with his wife and children, sought refuge in France; but the following year, 1213, his friends persuaded him to return home, and, with the other Barons, he was reconciled to King John. But this friendship was only of short duration, for soon it was discovered that he was still plotting against the King in the interests of reform in the government; so his residence in London, the Castle of Baynard, was in consequence almost entirely destroyed, and the hatred between King John and FitzWalter became yet more violent. His lands were seized, effectually binding him to the discontented Barons and the people. The active spirit of FitzWalter made him a desirable leader for their party, and he was selected as one of the commissioners who hoped to cement the differences of opinion at a meeting at Erith Church, and subsequently was elected their leader.

After the granting of Magna Charta, when King John endeavored to elude his promises, FitzWalter was one of the committee of the Baronial party which went to France to invite the Dauphin to accept the throne of England and, on this Prince's coming, he with William de Mandeville and William de Huntingfield, the Sureties, reduced the counties of Essex and Suffolk to the authority of the Dauphin. Upon the accession of Henry III, FitzWalter, then a prisoner, along with a majority of the rebel Barons, finding the Dauphin a useless political factor, dropped him and sent him back to France. In 1218, although he was a prisoner, FitzWalter was allowed to assume the Cross and join a Crusade. He took part in the famous siege of Damietta, returned home and died a peaceful death in 1234. He was buried before the High Altar of Dunmow Priory.

Notwithstanding his enmity to King John and King Henry III, and the frequent confiscation of his property, FitzWalter died possessed of an extensive estate. The monk, Matthew Paris, records: "In the same year (1234/5) at the advent of Our Lord, Robert FitzWalter, a Baron of illustrious race, and renowned in feats of arms, went the way of all flesh." His first wife was Gunora, daughter of Robert, second lord of Valoines, and he married second, Rohese, who survived him. By his first wife, FitzWalter had, with other children, a daughter, Matilda the Fair, called "Maid Marion," said to have been poisoned by King John.

Norwich Castle, once a formidable fortress, has almost but not quite disappeared. It now stands high upon a steep mound. It is still partly surrounded by earthworks, and a ditch is spanned by a very early bridge. Only the square Norman keep remains, with its four tiers of colonades on the outside and an ornate doorway to the Great Tower. From 1345 to 1857 the building served as a prison, but when the new jail was erected outside the City, the Castle was acquired by the City Corporation and, by 1894, was adapted as a museum and art gallery.

Dunmow Castle, the estate of Robert FitzWalter, has not attracted the eye of any historian.

FORTIBUS

WILLIAM de FORTIBUS, the youngest of the Magna Charta Sureties, came of age in 1214/5, when King John confirmed to him all the lands which accrued to him by inheritance from his mother, and he succeeded in her right as Earl of Albemarle.

Although originally on the side of the Barons, this Surety deserted them and joined King John in that expedition into the North of England so marked by destruction. For his services the King granted him all the lands belonging to his sister Alice, the wife of William Marshall, Jr., the Surety, and constituted him in 1218, governor of the Castles of Rockingham in Northamptonshire, Sauvey in Leistershire and Botham in Lincolnshire, with strict command to destroy all the houses, parks and possessions of those Barons who were in arms against the King. In the reign of King Henry III this nobleman fought under the Royal banner at the Battle of Lincoln, and shared largely in the spoils of the victory. He was alternately for and against the Charter. Since he was opposed to the King, his submission was accomplished only by excommunication. In 1230 he was one of the commanders of the Royal troops in Normandy. He set out on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and died on the Mediterranean Sea 29 March 1241.

Of William de Fortibus the monk, Matthew Paris, wrote: "As the weather was at this time (1241) favorable, William de Fortibus, Earl of Albemarle, a bold knight (and other knights named) took leave of their friends and, commending themselves to the prayers of religious men, set out in great pomp towards Jerusalem and, embarking at the Mediterranean Sea in the Autumn, sailed forth on their voyage across the sea: 1241. Among the English nobles who died this year was one William de Forbes (Sic.) Earl of Albemarle who, when on his pilgrimage, was taken ill on the Mediterranean Sea, and being unable to eat, endured protracted sufferings for eight days and on Friday next before Easter, on which Christ on the Cross resigned his spirit to his Father, he in like manner resigned his spirit to Christ."

William has been described by Bishop Stubbs as "a feudal adventurer of the worst type." He changed sides as often as suited his policy. Following his election as a Surety he wanted, most of all, to revive the independent power of the feudal Barons, and carried out his plans with Falkes de Breauté and other foreign adventurers whom John had established in the country. He was twice excommunicated, once in John's reign, once in Henry III's. He was never really in the Royal favor until after the death of Falkes de Breauté.

HARDELL

WILLIAM de HARDELL, the Surety, was Mayor of the City of London at the time of the insurrection of the Barons. It is highly probable that it was he who induced the citizens to deliver up one of the entrances of the City to the Barons, the one called the Aldgate, through which they passed Sunday morning, 17 May 1215, while the people were at Mass.

There is no evidence that Hardell was a feudal Baron or a Baron by tenure and, since he was a civil officer of so early a period, there is some doubt as to the arms attributed to him. He served as sheriff of the City of London in 1207, and was the first Mayor of the City by popular election in 1215, by consent of King John. It was at his installation that the "Ridings" or Lord Mayor's Shows were instituted, when the candidate was obliged by Royal command to ride in state to Westminster, where the Royal palace was situated and where the judges sat, to be presented for the King's approval.

DOVER CASTLE

HUNTINGFIELD

Dover Castle, the stronghold which William de Huntingfield held in the Barons' War, is a famous one, fulfilling the dream of the grim place of nameless cruelties and horrible prisons. It was built near the site of the ancient Roman Pharos or lighthouse. Legends attest that once William the Conqueror advised Harold to fortify it, then to deliver it up to the Normans when the time came, for it was a stout coastal defense. Harold was allegedly enticed to swear to do this, but if he did swear it, he took his oath lightly.

The Castle was completed by the son of Godwin, and was set high upon a rock above the sea. The rock was cut so that it was flush with the wall. By 1066 Dover Castle was thoroughly established, but there is no doubt that the wide encircling walls, the sturdy watch towers and massive keep are Norman. Even so, there were probably Roman and Saxon forts on the same site. The keep is believed to have been erected by Henry II about 1154. But the whole Castle, as we can envision it today, dates to a much earlier period.

WILLIAM de HUNTINGFIELD, the Surety, born about 1165, married Isabel Gressinghall, widow of Osmond de Stuteville. He was made constable of Dover Castle in 1204, and delivered up his son and daughter as hostages for his loyalty to the King. The son was to remain with the Earl of Arundel, the daughter with Earl Ferrers.

He was one of five wardens of the Ports of Norfolk and Suffolk from 1210 to 1212, and the following year he was one of the itinerant justices of Lincoln. He was high sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk until the end of 1214. He witnessed King John's grant of freedom of election to churches in 1214. He was governor of Sauvey Castle in Leistershire when he joined the cause of the Barons in arms against King John, and was excommunicated by the Pope. His lands were then given to Nicholas de Haya. According to the close and patent rolls he was one of the men actively in rebellion against King John before the issuance of Magna Charta. Very likely the cause of the Protector's severity toward Huntingfield was that he was one of those who plotted to have the Dauphin come to England and, after the Dauphin's landing, was very active in reducing the Courts of Essex and Suffolk to French authority. He fought at Lincoln 20 May 1217, and was taken prisoner by the King's forces. William had a daughter, Alice Huntingfield, who was married twice, but the name of her first husband has not been preserved. Her father paid the King a fine of "six fair Norway Goshawks," in the 15th of King John, for permission to marry Alice, his daughter, then a widow, to Richard de Solers. William de Huntingfield, the Surety, died 25 January 1220/1 on a Crusade.

CRUSADER

LACIE

The Lacie strongholds on the Welsh border are Beeston, Chester and Halton Castles. Beeston is now a crumbling ruin. It is hard even to identify the keep, but it could be the large wall tower East of the gate house. The Castle is perched on a height bounded on three sides by sheer drops, and a steep slope on the fourth. Its strength as a defense lay in its inaccessibility. There are two baileys, the innermost on a summit and the other situated on the sloping ground. The inner bailey was guarded on the approachable side by a gate house, two wall towers and a ditch thirty-five feet wide and thirty feet deep, which cut across the promontory. It is important to note that the artificial ravine was fashioned two hundred fifty years before blasting was known. The date of founding was in the 13th Century, and it was founded by Randolph de Blondevill, Earl of Chester.

Chester was the last City to yield to William the Conqueror, and the surrender came in 1070. Once the Normans had the Castle, William's nephew, Hugh Lupus, Palatine Earl of Chester, was appointed as head of the border patrol.

Chester Castle was originally built by the first Norman Earl of Chester, and now consists of modern buildings, the assize-court, jail and barracks. The one remaining Norman relic is "Julius Caesar's Tower," standing by the River. It is a square tower which has been used as a powder magazine, but is scarcely recognizable as a Norman building, because it has been recently recased in red stone. With the exception of this tower, another of the round style, and adjacent buildings in the upper ward, the Castle was dismantled at the end of the 18th Century. From Julius Caesar's Tower one can see the ruins of Beeston Castle, which met a like fate in 1646. Of Halton Castle nothing is left. But Lincoln Castle, on the other side of the Island, is an important monument.

Lincoln was the fourth City of the Realm when the Normans invaded, and it seemed to William to be a logical site for a castle. The Domesday Book states that one hundred sixty-six houses were torn down to make way for it. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle held that on his return to York in 1068, William erected the Castle on the site of a Roman fort. Since the land was rather flat, a great bank was built up around it. There are two mottes, the larger one crowned by a polygonal shell wall, which may have been built by Ralph de Gernon's widow. In 1140 King Stephen captured the Castle and, in 1216, the Surety Barons had charge of it.

JOHN de LACIE, the Surety, born 1192, seventh Baron of Halton Castle and hereditary constable of Chester, was one of the earliest Barons to take up arms at the time of Magna Charta. He was also appointed to see that the new statutes were properly carried into effect and observed in the counties of York and Nottingham. He was excommunicated by the Pope. Upon the accession of King Henry III, he joined a party of noblemen and made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, rendering valuable service at the Siege of Damietta.

In 1232 Lacie was made Earl of Lincoln and, in 1240, governor of Chester and Beeston Castles. He died 22 July 1240, and was buried in the Cistercian Abbey of Stanlaw in co. Chester. The monk, Matthew Paris, records: "On the 22d day of July, in this year (1240), which was St. Magdalen's Day, John, Earl of Lincoln, after suffering from a long illness went the way of all flesh." His first wife was Alice, daughter of Gilbert 'dAquila, but by her he had no issue. She died in 1215 and he married second, after his marked gallantry at the Siege of Damietta, Margaret, only daughter and heiress of Robert de Quincey, a fellow Crusader, who died in the Holy Land, eldest son of Saire de Quincey, the Surety. They had three children, Lady Margaret survived him and married second Walter Marshall, Earl of Pembroke.

LANVALLEI

WILLIAM de LANVALLEI, the Surety, died 1217. He was governor of Colchester Castle (see later under Quincey) in 1215, when he joined the insurgent Barons. He also had Stanway Castle, which has since crumbled to dust. In 1212 Alan Basset of Wycombe, co. Bucks (father of Philip Basset, Chief Justice of England, who is named in Magna Charta as one of the King's liegemen) gave the King two hundred marks and "an excellent palfrey," so that his daughter Hawise might be married to William de Lanvallei.

MALET

WILLIAM MALET, the Surety, was mentioned as a minor in the year 1194, in connection with an expedition made that year into Normandy. His principal estate was Curry-Malet. From 1210 to 1214 he was sheriff of counties Somerset and Dorset. He then joined the Barons against King John and became one of the Sureties. He had lands in four counties which were confiscated and given to his son-in-law, Hugh de Vivonia, Thomas Basset, and to his father-in-law, and Malet was excommunicated by the Pope in 1216. He was also fined 2,000 marks, but the sum was not paid until after his death, and at that time 1,000 marks were remitted, being found due to him for military service to King John in Poitou. It is interesting to note that there were five contemporary relatives named Malet, all of whom held lands in England or in Jersey. William Malet died about 1217, having married Mabel, called also Alice and Aliva, daughter of Thomas Basset of Headington. Nothing now remains of Malet's estate of Curry-Malet.

Geoffrey de Mandeville's Castle at Gloucester is nothing but a city jail, yet once it was a Saxon Castle and later a Norman stronghold.

MANDEVILLE

GEOFFREY de MANDEVILLE, the Surety, upon paying King John 20,000 marks, obtained a license in 1214 to marry Avisa or Isabella, daughter of William, Count of Meullent, who had first been King John's wife, but who was repudiated in 1200 because of consanguinity, since both the King and Queen were great grandchildren of King Henry I. Geoffrey died two years after their marriage, and Avisa was promised to Hubert de Burgh, but the marriage never took place, and she died without issue. In right of his wife Geoffrey de Mandeville became Earl of Gloucester, and was placed in full possession of all the liberties belonging to this Earldom and to the lordship of Glamorgan in Wales. He was one of the wealthiest of the Barons opposed to King John. He was excommunicated for adhering to the Barons' party. His life was short. He was mortally wounded in a tournament in London in February 1216, and died 23 February, without issue. He was interred in the Priory of the Holy Trinity in the suburbs of the City.

He was succeeded by his brother William de Mandeville, who also took the part of the Barons and maintained it, even after the death of King John, for he had assisted Louis of France in the siege of Berkamstead Castle, which was occupied by the King's forces. William died without issue 8 January 1227, when the Earldom of Essex devolved upon his sister, Maud Bohun, Countess of Hereford, while the lands which he inherited passed to his half brother, John FitzGeoffrey, whose wife was Isabel Bigod, widow of Gilbert de Lacie and daughter of Hugh Bigod, the Surety.

MARSHALL

WILLIAM MARSHALL, the Surety, was sometimes as strenuous a supporter of the Baronial cause as his father was of the Royal interests; consequently he was excommunicated by the Pope. When the Dauphin came to London he was one of the prominent men who recognized him as King of England. Upon the death of King John, the Protector procured the consent of the Barons to the coronation of young Henry, requiring the allegiance of the Barons including his own son, William Marshall, Jr. When the rebels were finally conquered, he went back to the King's cause, profiting nicely at the expense of some of his slower former colleagues. In 1223/4 he returned from Ireland and gained a great victory over Prince Llewellyn and the Welsh who in his absence had taken two of his castles. He was made governor of the Castles of Caerdigan and Caermarthen and, in 1230, captain-general of all the King's forces in Bretagne. William Marshall succeeded as second Earl of Pembroke and died 24 April 1231, very wealthy but without issue.

The Marshall country is the tip end of the Welsh Peninsula. One of his finest Castles was Pembroke. It is situated on a singularly steep hill, while the town clings precariously to the slopes. Although the Castle is now a county jail, it still retains some of the atmosphere of the old fortress, for it dwarfs all else with its bulk. Externally it is one of the finest ruins in Wales. It was originally built by Arnulph de Montgomery at the close of the 11th Century. The buildings of the outer ward were added not earlier than the 14th Century. The great vaulted keep, erected by William Marshall about 1200, is almost intact. There is a handsome gateway with slender flanking turrets, and the Great Hall is well preserved. Beneath the banqueting hall there is a vast cavern, known as the "Wogan," giving access to the harbor.

The Castle has been restored. Early in the 20th Century it was strongly fortified and occupied by a small garrison. Barracks filled the Court. The keep is in excellent condition, with its walls twenty-three feet thick and a hundred feet high. Inside there are a Norman chapel and a three-hundred-foot wall which is said to have been dug by Harold.

MONTBEGON

ROGER de MONTBEGON, the Surety, was the successor of Adam de Monte Begonis, whose principal lands were in Lincolnshire. Roger was apparently the son of this Adam by his wife Maud FitzSwaine. During the imprisonment of Richard I in Germany, Roger de Montbegon seems to have favored Prince John's designs on the throne, since he was one of those who held the Castle of Nottingham against the Bishop of Durham. When, however, the King on his return advanced to besiege that fortress, he came out and submitted himself without shooting an arrow. He was one of the most adamant in refusing to pay the levy assessed to those who did not supply the King with soldiers, and must have been more mercurial than most of the Barons. Whenever he was in one of his periodic lapses of disgrace, the King would reclaim some of the lands he had previously granted. In the Barons' proceedings to procure the Charter of Liberty from King John, he took a prominent part and was one of the parties to the covenant for surrendering the City and Tower of London into the hands of the Barons, although several lordships were granted or confirmed to him by King John as late as 1215/6. There is, however, no reason to doubt his original loyalty to the cause of the Barons for, when he took up arms against the King, his possessions were seized and given to Oliver d'Albini, while he himself was excommunicated with the other Barons. Roger de Montbegon had no issue by his wife Olivia, whom he married about 1200, widow of Robert St. John. When he died in 1225/6 his Castle of Horneby in Lancashire was given by the King to John de Warren, Earl of Surrey; but when Henry de Montbegon became heir to Roger, he recovered it. Nevertheless, Roger deserted the Barons before Magna Charta was confirmed a year, and Roger de Mowbray was substituted for him among the Sureties. He was a younger brother of the Surety William de Mowbray. He did not marry and died in 1217/8, his elder brother William, succeeding to his estate. The armorial ensigns of Roger de Mowbray are extant in the South aisle of Westminster Abbey, as he was one of its benefactors.

Horneby Castle in Lancashire, now the seat of the Duke of Leeds, has not been of sufficient interest to warrant a description. On the other hand, Nottingham, the other Castle held by Roger de Montbegon, was once the key to the North. It now is overshadowed by a palatial combination museum and art gallery. It occupies a conspicuous site on a steep, rocky hill. The original remains include a restored Norman gateway and some few fragments of fortifications.

Nottingham Castle seems to owe its origin to the Danes, who are said to have erected a fort in 868. The later building was probably ordered by Edward the Elder. The rock motte evidently was not severed from the rest of the headland by a ditch until the Norman Castle was built, under the direction of William the Conqueror in 1067, when William returned, on the occasion of Yorkshire's first rebellion. Apparently realizing that this was the foremost midland fortress, he left William Peverel in command.

The two upper wards could have been suggested by William. The upper one forms a natural motte of rock, fifteen feet higher than the bailey attached to it. The keep has Norman buttresses. The North side of the small ward which formed the top of the motte was enclosed in a shell wall, no longer in existence. The Castle has been so changed by a 17th Century spoiler that the work of King Henry and King John is all gone, except for one small tower which seems to have been a part of the inner bailey defense system.

MONTFICHET

RICHARD de MONTFICHET, the Surety, was under age at the time of his father's death, and his wardship was committed to Roger de Lacie, Constable of Chester. He evidently came of age almost within the month of the signing of Magna Charta. It is notable that so young a man was so soon elected a Surety for the observance of Magna Charta, and to a position of political responsibility. As he was not of age until the Spring of 1215, his first public act appears to have been that of joining the Baronial party in arms against the King. The next year he went with the Surety Robert FitzWalter into France to solicit aid and continued to be one of the most enthusiastic of the Barons, until he was taken prisoner at Lincoln. Even after he was released he attended a tournament at Blithe in the 7th of King Henry III, contrary to the King's, that is, the Protector's prohibition, for which his lands were seized. Later he made peace with the King and was, in 1236/7, constituted Justice of the King's forests or game parks in nineteen counties of England, and in 1241/2 was made sheriff of Essex and governor of Hertford Castle. It would appear that he was the last survivor of the Sureties.

Richard de Montfichet died without issue, never having married, and after 1258 his lands were divided among his three sisters, one of whom was Aveline, wife of William de Fortibus, the Magna Charta Surety.

MOWBRAY

WILLIAM de MOWBRAY, the Surety, came of age in 1194/5. He was early embittered against King John by being compelled to surrender the Barony of Frontboeuf, which Henry I had conferred upon his great grandfather, Sir Nigel d'Aubigny. That, and the aid exacted from his vassals, enraged him. We note in Magna Charta, Article 16, that a lord is forbidden to demand more service than a fief owes. Perhaps William was influential in getting this clause accepted. The debt was probably exacted because Mowbray, upon the accession of King John, was tardy in pledging his allegiance and at length swore fealty only on condition that "the King should render to every man his right." At the breaking out of the Baronial war, he was governor of York Castle, and it is not surprising that he at once sided with the Barons against King John, and was one of the most forward among them.

He was a party to the "Covenant for holding the City and Tower of London," and one of those whom the Pope excommunicated. He continued in arms after the death of King John, and in the Battle of Lincoln he was taken prisoner. His lands were confiscated and bestowed upon William Marshall, Jr., the Surety, but he was subsequently allowed to redeem them. After this he attached himself to King Henry III. He died in 1223/4 at his Castle in the Isle of Axholme, and was buried in the Abbey of Newburgh in Yorkshire. His wife was Avice d'Albini.

The Mowbray Castles are an impressive array. Axholme seems to offer no discernible ruins, and the land has become a swamp. New-Castle-upon-Tyne boasts a stern building in dreary surroundings, built on the site of an earlier fortress, and thus its present name. It has more the appearance of a prison than a Royal stronghold, partly because its walls are begrimed with factory smoke. However, if it had been left out in the country, it might have fallen into ruins sooner. It is an exceptionally fine example of a Norman stronghold.

The keep is the chief relic of the Castle on the Tyne. For centuries it was the residence of Royalty when Kings visited the North. It symbolized their power at those times when they were not in residence. It was founded by Robert, son of the Conqueror. It had massive walls and was flanked by a moat on the town side, while the steep climb discouraged approach from the River. The present keep is a later building, dated in the last decade of the 12th Century. Only once did William the Conqueror stop here. At the end of the Century Robert de Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, seized and garrisoned it in his effort to dethrone William Rufus. At the death of Henry I it was captured by King David of Scotland. Stephen arrived with an army, and a truce was arranged, whereby King Stephen agreed to cede Northumberland to the Scottish Kings who, from then on, held court at Newcastle.

The Castle was founded in the 11th Century by Robert Curthose, but the keep, which is all that is left, dates from about 1172. It is eighty-five feet high; to the top of the turret it measures one hundred seven feet, and its walls are from twelve to eighteen feet thick. The second floor is reached by an outside staircase. The chapel, the finest room, is located in the basement. Both the Great Hall and the Well Chamber have been well preserved.

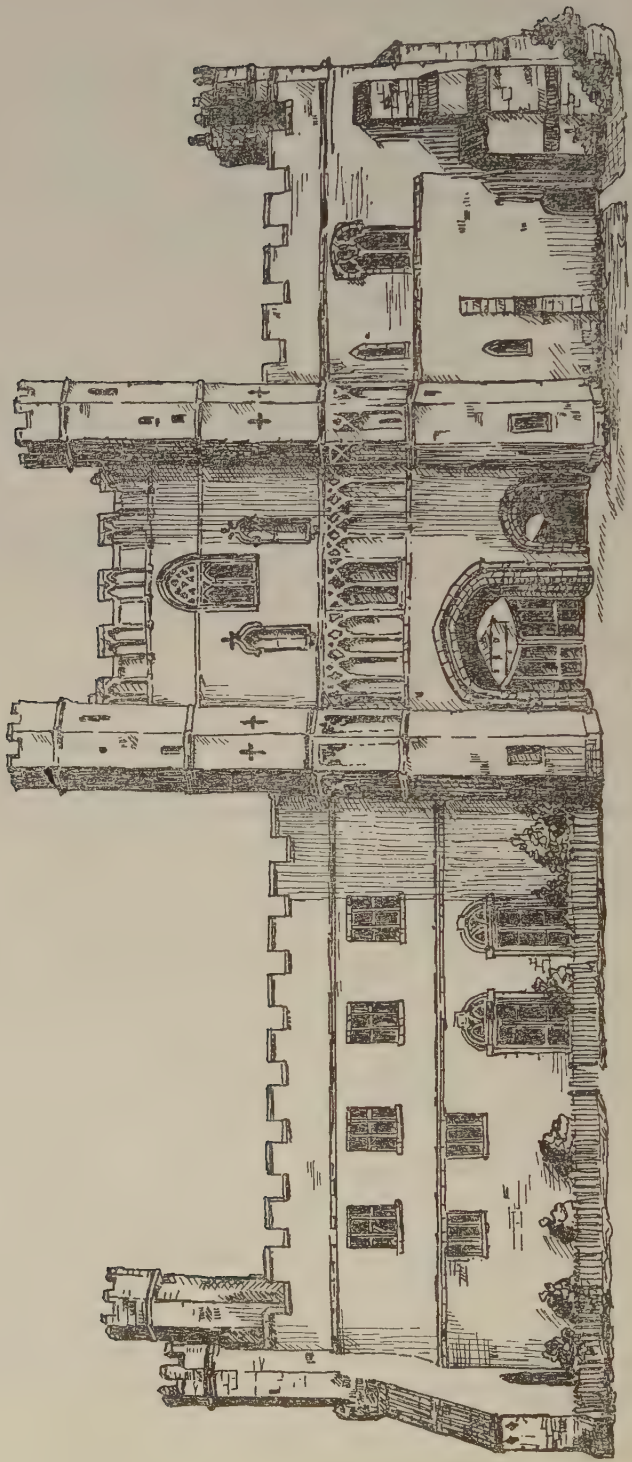
Originally Newcastle was the strongest fortress in the North. Before its completion William the Lion was marched through its gates, after the capture of Alnwick and Baliol 26 December 1262, and did homage to Edward I as King of Scotland, in Newcastle's Great Hall.

The area within the outer walls and fosse measured three acres. Fragments of the wall, the Black Gate, the principal entrance, stand encased in late construction. The Watergate or Southern Postern has disappeared entirely. The keep is well preserved and the chapel also, a fine example of late Norman style.

William the Conqueror built two Castles at York. His second Castle is now marked by Baile Hill; the mound of the Castle is nonexistent. Clifford's Tower marks the place of the keep of the former Castle, near which in 1188/9 five hundred Jews were massacred in the reign of Richard I.

PERCY

RICHARD de PERCY, the Surety, inherited from his aunt, the "Countess of Warwick," who died without issue, her share of the Percy heritage. He was one of the first powerful lords to take up arms against King John in the cause of "a constitutional government," and was excommunicated. He died without issue about 1244.



BATTLE ABBEY

QUINCEY

SAIRE de QUINCEY, the Surety, born before 1154, was a Baron present at Lincoln when William the Lion of Scotland did homage to the English monarch in October 1200. He obtained large grants and immunities from King John and was created Earl of Winchester, 2 March 1207, having been governor in 1203 of the Castle of Ruil in Normandy. He is credited with rewriting Magna Charta from the Charter of King Henry I and the Saxon Code. Because he had opposed the King's concession to the Pope's legate, he was bitterly hated by King John. One of the Barons to whom the City and Tower of London were resigned, Saire de Quincey was excommunicated with the other Barons the following year. He was sent, with Robert Fitz-Walter, the Surety, by the other Barons, to invite the Dauphin of France to assume the Crown of England and, even after the death of King John, he kept a strong garrison in Montsorell Castle in behalf of Prince Louis. When the Barons, being greatly outnumbered, were defeated by the troops of King Henry III, Saire de Quincey, with many others, was made prisoner and his estates forfeited. In the following October his immense estates were restored upon his submission. In 1218 the Earl of Winchester went with the Earls of Chester and Arundel to the Holy Land, assisted at the siege of Damietta in 1219, and died 3 November in the same year, on the way to Jerusalem. His wife was Margaret Beaumont, whom he married before 1173.

At the beginning of John's reign Saire de Quincey was not a Baron, much less a great one. In the civil war the King had had the advantage over the rebels. Few of the Barons had had much actual military experience. The Barons' contribution to the war was the scutage they paid, a war fund substituted for the contingent of knights owed to the King's service. The money was collected from vassals, and mercenary knights were paid from it. Many of the mercenaries were regulars who served the same Baron from campaign to campaign, but those Barons who are known to have had extensive military experience were only Saire de Quincey, Robert FitzWalter, William de Mowbray, William d'Albini, Roger de Cressi and Robert de Roos.

Saire de Quincey is associated with two stalwart Castles in the South of England: Colchester and Winchester, both with the Latin castrum root, signifying that they were once the sites of Roman forts.

Colchester Castle could not have been built before the early 12th Century, though Roman materials may have been re-used in its construction. The keep, the only portion now surviving, is in complete harmony with other Norman castles. Colchester must have been a formidable stronghold, and a challenge to Saire de Quincey. The King's men held the Castle against Quincey, the first Earl to attack Colchester. John had given the fortress into the charge of a Fleming whom he thought he could trust. But Quincey took the Castle, and later found holding it more difficult. The fighting was of such a nature that John himself came to Colchester to see just how stubborn Saire de Quincey was. The Earl held the Castle for two months, but lack of food forced him to give up and take flight to France.

Colchester was the largest Norman keep in England. It measures one hundred fifty-two by one hundred seventeen feet, enclosing nearly twice the area of the Tower of London. Its walls vary between eleven and thirty feet in thickness. It was erected either by William the Conqueror or by William II. It is of the quadrangular variety, turreted at the corners. In it and elsewhere herringbone masonry has been noted.

Winchester Castle was first erected by William the Conqueror. Later alterations and extra height were added by Henry III, about the year 1138. The great Hall has Purbeck columns of 13th Century architecture, supporting a restored roof and containing handsome windows of the same approximate period. Only the keep remains. "How commonplace this saying, 'Only the keep still stands,' . . . thanks to the old builders who made the keep strong and high to withstand time, and so difficult to tear down that it escaped the looters of the ages." Perhaps Murphy was thinking of Colchester or Winchester when he thus wrote, for this was the fate of the Quincey strongholds.

ROOS

The Barons de Roos owned Helmsley or Hamlake Castle. Baedeker remarks only that it is an interesting Castle, but we can give some description of it. Hamlake has a rectangular bailey, a barbican, and an outwork at the East end of the bailey. Its singular defense was a double line of ditches, both of which were fed by the River Rye. The curtain wall was built about 1170, and the keep about 1190. The East gateway and barbican are ascribed to the 13th Century. The Castle, except for the keep, was destroyed in 1649. The other half remains, one hundred feet above the bailey. The keep is an excellent example of traditional design, combining the old square style with coming roundness in towers. The outside of the tower is rounded to baffle sappers, and the portion inside the curtain is square, as a convenience for the occupants.

ROBERT de ROOS of Fursan, the Surety, fourth Baron of Hamlake Manor, was born in 1177. When only fifteen years of age he had paid a thousand marks' fine for livery of his lands, and in 1197 when aged twenty years, while with the King of Normandy, he was arrested, though we know nothing of the offense, and was committed to the custody of Hugh de Chaumont. However, de Chaumont trusted his prisoner to William de Spiney, and the latter allowed him to escape out of the Castle of Bonville. King Richard thereupon hanged de Spiney and collected a fine of twelve hundred marks, about eight hundred pounds, from Roos' guardian as the price of his continued freedom.

When John became King, he gave young Roos the whole Barony of his great grandmother's father, Walter d'Espec, as conciliation. About the 14th of King John, Robert assumed the habit of a monk, whereupon the custody of all his lands and Castle Werke, were committed to Philip d'Ulcote. But Robert did not long continue as a recluse, as in about a year he was executing the office of high sheriff of co. Cumberland. At the beginning of the struggle of the Barons for a constitutional government, he at first sided with King John and, in consequence, obtained some valuable grants from the Crown. He was made governor of Carlisle, but was later won over by the Barons. He returned to his allegiance in the reign of Henry III for, in 1217/8, his manors were restored to him, and, although he was a witness to the second Great Charter and the Forest Charter of 1224, he seems to have been in favor with the King.

Roos erected the Castles of Helmsley, or Hamlake, in Yorkshire, and of Werke, in Northumberland. He was a member of the Order of Knights Templar. He died in 1226/7 and was buried "in his proper habit" in the Knights' Church, or the New Temple in London, where his tomb may be seen. His effigy is described by Gough, in "Sepulchral Monuments," as "the most elegant of all the figures in the Temple Church, representing a comly young knight in mail, and a flowing mantle with a kind of cowl; his hair neatly curled at the sides; his crown appears shaved. His hands are elevated in a praying posture, and on his left arm is a short, pointed shield charged with three water-bougets. He has on his left side a long sword, and the armor of his legs, which are crossed, has a ridge, or a seam up the front, continued over the knee.At his feet is a lion, and the whole figure measures six feet two inches." He married Isabel, daughter of William the Lion, King of Scotland, and widow of Robert Bruce.

SAYE

GEOFFREY de SAYE, the Surety, was in arms with the other Barons against the King, and consequently his extensive lands and possessions in ten counties were seized. These were given to Peter de Crohim. Six of the counties we can name: Northampton, Cambridge, Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk and Lincoln, but we cannot be sure of what Castles in those areas were Geoffrey's, or which other four counties he could claim.

While William d'Albini and his companions were holding Rochester Castle, they had been assured that other Baronial leaders would relieve them if the Castle were to be besieged by King John. Such a rescue would not have been easy unless the Royal guards were lax in watching the bridge over the Medway. If this bridge were under guard, a march to Rochester from London along the Dover Road would prove impossible, the company then being forced to detour and approach Rochester from Maidstone. Nevertheless, on 26 October, they moved in as far as Dover, where they soon heard that the King was on his way to meet them. They promptly returned to London, leaving the Rochester garrison to do the best it could.

Perhaps the march on Rochester was a sop to the Barons' consciences. Had it been a serious move, it would have been an extraordinarily foolish one. The only other attempt to save Rochester was negotiatory. On 9 November King John issued letters of conduct for Richard de Clare, Robert FitzWalter, Geoffrey de Saye and the Mayor of London, to confer with the Royal emissaries: Peter de Roches, Hubert de Burgh and the Earls of Arundel and Warren. There is no certainty that these men ever met. If indeed they did, nothing came of it. We suspect that the meeting was originally planned with the hope that a proposal would be accepted, and it is not unlikely that the proposal would have been a willingness to surrender Rochester Castle to the King if the garrison could go free, but no such move resulted. Yet despite the futility of the meeting, at least we see Geoffrey de Saye connected, if lightly, with Rochester Castle. And this is the only Castle with which we are able to link his name.

Geoffrey de Saye returned to the Royalist party when the civil war was over, and sided with King Henry III, thereby regaining his lost lands after the expulsion of the Dauphin. He died 24 October 1230, leaving a son, William, as his heir, by Alice, daughter of William de Cheney.

VERE

The principal residence of the de VERES was Castle Headingham. The keep still stands sentry guard over the River Colne in the North of Essex, probably erected by Aubrey de Vere, who died in 1194. The Headingham keep ranks with that of Rochester as the finest of the square keeps in England.

Oxford Castle was the seat of the Earls de Vere. It now consists of little more than a Norman tower which stands inside the walls of a county jail. It was here that King Stephen laid siege to Matilda in 1141. She escaped by a rope ladder fashioned from bed sheets during the night and, fleeing, found refuge at Wallingford.

Oxford Castle is thought to be the oldest in all England. The Norman structure was built in 1071 by Robert d'Oilly. From what is left of it we can conclude that it was originally a pre-Norman motte and bailey fort. After the 1071 rebuilding, alterations were made by Henry II, between 1165 and 1173. He added the houses inside the shell keep, and also the well. He presumably built the diagonal keep on the motte, the foundations of which were discovered in the 18th Century.

ROBERT de VERE, the Surety, born after 1164, became heir to his brother, Aubrey de Vere, who died without issue before September of 1214, and who was reputed to be one of the "evil councillors" of King John. Although he was hereditary lord great Chamberlain of the kingdom, Robert pursued a different course in politics from that of his brother, and became one of the principal Barons in arms against King John, a party to that covenant which resigned the custody of the City and Tower of London to the Barons, and one of those excommunicated by the Pope. In the beginning of the reign of King Henry III, after he had made his peace with that young monarch following the Battle of Lincoln, Robert was received into his favor, and was appointed one of the judges in the Court of King's Bench, but he died only a few months afterward, 25 October 1221, and was buried in the Priory of Hatfield, Broad Oak, in Essex. His wife was Isabel, who died 3 February 1245, daughter of Hugh, second Baron de Bolebec in Northumberland.

VESCI

The VESCI family had control of Alnwick Castle (pronounced "Onick") built as a threat to Scotland in Northumberland. The Vesci family came to an end, and the Castle went to the Percys in 1309. It is now in fragments, embodied in a palace of later date. The walls have been integrated into the residence of the Dukes of Northumberland. The property consists of five acres. Fortunately, parts of the building have been restored. The oldest of these is the Norman gateway, dating from the 12th Century, also the well in the keep.

In the second half of the 18th Century more than half the Castle was renovated, and an Italian style of decoration was applied to the interior. In the park there is a monument commemorating the capture of William the Lion, when he besieged the town in 1174.

According to the chronicler of Alnwick Abbey, the Barony of Alnwick belonged to Gilbert Tyson prior to the Conquest. His son and heir, William, was killed at Hastings, leaving no issue. His daughter and estates were granted to Ivo de Vesci. In 1297 William, first Baron Vesci, died without surviving issue, and left the Barony to the Bishop of Durham, who sold it to Sir Henry Percy. The Castle slowly became the center of the town, which supposedly received its borough charter from King John.

Alnwick Castle, built by Eustace FitzJohn in 1140, is said to be the finest example of its kind. It is one of those Castles that boast an open or shell keep and a complete enceinte. For two Centuries it remained tenantless until the present family succeeded. The restoration was instituted between 1750 and 1786.

Near Philadelphia, the mansion of the Harrison Estate, now Beaver College, Glenside, Pennsylvania, is a replica of the Castle of Alnwick in Northumberland. It is considered a very creditable facsimile.

EUSTACE de VESCI, the Surety, was feudal lord of Alnwick Castle. He came of age in 1190 and, in 1199, was sent by King John as one of the ambassadors to King William the Lion of Scotland. He married one of William's daughters. Soon he became closely connected with the rise and progress of the Baronial cause. In 1212 he and Robert FitzWalter, the Surety, were called to give security for faithful allegiance, whereupon they fled to Scotland. De Vesci's English possessions were seized and also his Castle of Alnwick, which was to be destroyed, but the order was never carried out. This order so embittered de Vesci that he became the most persistent of the King's enemies, and a principal leader in the insurrection. He soon was taking a prominent part in all their conventions, endeavoring to revive the laws of Edward the Confessor. He was one of the Barons to whom the City and Tower of London were committed. He was excommunicated, and was one of those who urged the Dauphin to come to England. While attending his brother-in-law, Alexander, King of Scots, as he welcomed Prince Louis and paid him Scotland's homage in 1216, Eustace de Vesci passed Bernard Castle in Yorkshire and noted that it displayed the Royal banner. He approached the Castle to see if and how it could be captured, and was mortally wounded in the attempt.

WINDSOR CASTLE

Two Residences of Royalty

When King John ruled England there were two Royal residences: Windsor Castle, twenty-one miles from London, on the Thames, and Corfe Castle on the Isle of Purbeck, co. Dorset, by the Sea. We know little about Windsor until Edward III came to the throne. It had always been the Royal residence, but in William the Conqueror's time it was not where it is now, nor was it in the days of King John.

WINDSOR CASTLE

Edward III is considered to have been the chief builder of Windsor Castle. We are told that at old Windsor there was a wooden Anglo-Saxon building predating Edward's structure. We assume that Edward was undertaking much reconstruction, perhaps on a Norman building, for he was in the process of restoring St. George's Chapel. Marshette Chute, in her delightful book, Geoffrey Chaucer of England, (New York, 1946) tells us that:

"In addition to his regular duties as Clerk of the Works, Chaucer was given a special commission to oversee the repairs that were scheduled for St. George's Chapel at Windsor. This was the Chapel in which the Knights of the Garter did reverence to their patron saint, and it had highly decorated walls, a great alabaster table before the high altar, and two volumes of French romances chained within the Chapel. King Edward had finished what he called this 'Chapel of convenient beauty' only four years earlier, and it was already in such a state, according to the commission appointing Chaucer to his task, that it would fall to the ground unless speedily repaired. . . .

"Chaucer left . . . after having served the King as his building superintendent for just under two years. He left his file of sixteen vouchers with the clerks of the Exchequer, and he turned over to the new Clerk of the Works a large pile of stone he had collected from Reigate and Stapleton to repair St. George's Chapel, which was now stored ready for use in the great hall at Windsor. Chaucer was responsible no longer for seeing that the gay little Chapel did not fall to the ground."

Edward the Confessor had granted Old Windsor to Westminster Abbey, but it was recovered by William the Conqueror for two other manors. William erected the Castle about two miles North of the village within the manor of Clewer, which was to be the nucleus for New Windsor (See J. E. Tighe, Annals of Windsor, London, 1858). We also hear that William purchased the land for New Windsor outright from the monks of Westminster Abbey.

Windsor Castle is now one of the most outstanding edifices of its type. It is situated high on a hill, where it flaunts its massive towers. Its great Round Tower, now somewhat higher than in Edward's day, can be seen almost anywhere in the surrounding country. From various points in the Park the fortress may be seen at the end of an avenue of stately trees, and when the sky is clear and the battlements streaming the Royal standards stand out in hard outline against it, it seems as though the pageantry of Edward's day were still alive.

There are a number of stories told of John's tenancy of Windsor. One is the gruesome tale of William de Braos' wife, Matilda, imprisoned in the Round Tower, with a sheaf of wheat and a slice of raw bacon as the only food offered to her and her child. When the guard opened the door eleven days later, the two were found dead. According to Sidney Painter, chroniclers agree that Matilda Braos and her younger son, William, were starved to death, but that her older son escaped. The confinement was the end of a long chase and varied chicanery, for John was determined to capture the acid-tongued Matilda at all costs. Previously John had seized some Baronial fortresses and, in his interdict of 24 March 1208, had put himself in such a position as to be kept in constant fear of the plots of the disaffected Barons. He therefore demanded hostages of the men he suspected. When his men approached Matilda saying that her sons were forfeit, she tartly replied that she would not give her sons to the man who had murdered his nephew. After that moment the Braos family were continually running from the King's men.

Another episode in the life of John at Windsor is his prelude to his Normandy campaign. He summoned a great council to meet with him at Northampton. Gerard de Camville, sheriff of Lincolnshire, and Reginald de Cornhill were to send two tuns of wine to the King at Windsor, presumably to sustain him at the meeting. Reginald was also to send the King a "Romanicum Historie Anglie," literally, "a Romance of the History of England," probably an English history in French, no doubt a highly exaggerated account of the daring deeds of old. But the description would have led Reginald to what was wanted. John apparently wanted to ply his guests with wine to make them convivial, and then regale them with the tales of their heroic ancestors. The picture of King John, readying himself for the council with two tuns of wine and a history book, is indeed picturesque.

CORFE CASTLE

On the Isle of Purbeck, a small peninsula of Southern Dorset, at its very center, stands Corfe, one of the most remarkable of the English Castles, built on an enormous mound. Before its gates stands the village of Corfe, an aggregate of cottages seemingly huddled beneath the ruin that towers above them. The entrance to the Castle stands high above the cottages, and the main portion of the fortress has foundations higher than the gateway. The enclosure is cut off from the village by a deep fosse, crossed by a higher arched bridge. From inside the curtain one sees the Castle proper. Masonry lies strewn about like glacial debris. Walls, towers and buttresses rear up like cliffs, softened by an occasional arras of ivy. So ruined is the structure that experienced archeologists have had trouble in restoring the original ground plan.

Even the keep, the one portion that in most castles, has defied time and destruction, here is shattered. One slice of the full height of the Great Tower stands alone, a splinter of a mighty donjon, looking like a chimney of a fire-gutted house. Corfe Castle is now in such a state that one is at a loss to distinguish one apartment from another.

According to King John, Corfe Castle was as nearly impregnable as any Castle could be. Certainly its strength must have surpassed the average, for the Castle claimed a great advantage, both in position and structure. Not only had John made it his country residence: it was his second Royal Court, and to its stout fastness he entrusted the Crown treasure. The ruins of Corfe date, for the most part, from the Norman period to the reign of Edward I.

Matters did not run well for Prince Arthur at Corfe. Arthur was the son of John's elder brother and, according to the opposition, was the rightful heir to the Throne. He had become the pawn of those who had failed to keep John from seizing the Throne for himself, a Throne for which they felt moderately sure he had plotted murder. Arthur took up arms against John to no avail, for Arthur, his sister Eleanor and some two hundred knights were taken prisoner. Arthur was murdered, and Eleanor and the knights were imprisoned at Corfe. With Eleanor were two daughters of the King of Scotland who, for a little time, brightened her days behind those dark walls.

But if the lot of Eleanor, the "Beauty of Brittany," and the two hundred, was sad, the cowardice and cruelty in the execution of a selected twenty-two was horrifying. John had these men sent to Corfe with instructions to the keeper of the Fort that he must carry out whatever oral instructions the Royal messengers gave. John apparently did not have the courage to write out his order and set his Seal to it, but rather let the appearance of ruthlessness fall on someone else. The messengers ordered that twenty-two of the knights were to be thrown into the strongest cells and were to be systematically starved to death. This form of liquidation seemed to have had the strongest appeal to the King.

Such is the picture of the two Royal Castles which were the homes of King John, and in which he confined and starved those who displeased him. Windsor, the House of Kings since pre-Conquest days, was perhaps a neighbor to a Royal seat a few miles removed some hundred years before, and has been the home of Royalty without interruption until the present day, whereas Corfe Castle, the seacoast retreat, where William d'Albini waited in chains after his garrison had been starved out of Rochester, is a windswept scene of desolation and mighty ruin.

In the article on English castles in the National Geographic Magazine, 1947, the author points out that it is significant that there is much left of the great cathedrals, that most of their beauty still remains. Buildings erected for worship and inspiration have stood, but the military works, even the strongest, are scattered bits of masonry, a single tower or a grass-covered mound. Bats and owls haunt the castle towers, but choirs still sing in naves seven hundred years old.

THE TOWER OF LONDON

The motte for the Tower of London is an elevation, now called Tower Hill, on the East side of the City, on the North side of the Thames. It is now said to have been an ancient British stronghold. Tradition has it, however, that the first founder of the Tower was Julius Caesar, and remains of Roman fortifications have been found underneath the present site.

The fortress covers a roughly hexagonal tract, surrounded by a ditch once fed by the Thames. The ditch is now dry. Two lines of fortifications surround the inner bailey in which stands the keep, known as the White Tower, with its four turrets. It was built by Gundulph, Bishop of Rochester, about 1078. Its towers are of the early type, square like Colchester's. The outer circuit measures 1,050 yards. In some places the double curtain walls are forty feet high and twelve feet thick. The inner ward was formerly known as the Royal Quarter. It was defended by twelve great towers, spaced at irregular intervals. The outer ward was known as the Folks' Quarters. Since this was a Royal and a National stronghold, the King's officers probably held the inner bailey, while the outer served as a rallying place for the common soldiery, later John's mercenaries.

The White Tower is typically Norman. It was commenced at the behest of William the Conqueror in 1078, and completed thirty years later. The original design was planned by Bishop Gundulph. Its length is one hundred sixteen feet, its width ninety-six feet, and it is ninety-two feet high, in three stories. Even though Christopher Wren refaced it and radically altered the windows, enough of the original remains to convince the spectator that this is indeed a noble product of the 11th Century, and the Lion Gate reminds him that in those days there was a menagerie under the Middle Tower, which was maintained until the middle 19th Century.

Here Henry de Bohun and Geoffrey de Mandeville fought their lawsuits, while under indirect fire from King John in the year 1212. The Mandeville family had claimed an hereditary custodianship of the Tower since the 11th Century. However, no strong King had ever honored the claim.

The safety of the Tower meant the safety of the City. The King's garrison held the Tower, but the City soon fell into the Barons' hands. By 17 May 1215 the King could have crushed the rebellion, but did not do so in order to impress the Pope. Had the Tower been out in the open country, the rebel host would have been short-lived. So few were the actual fighting men among the Barons that John's mercenaries would soon have made short work of them, but inside London's walls, aided and abetted by its citizens, the Barons were in a position to defy a strong army for a long time.

As to the old problem of the ownership of the Tower, its extreme military importance made John loath to relinquish it, and he postponed consideration of the Mandeville claim. Meanwhile the Tower was given into the keeping of Cardinal Stephen Langton and he continued to hold it while the Barons resisted the King in London, following the meeting at Runnemede. The Tower and the City were key points. The Tower was the military heart of the Capitol, and was therefore even more important to the King than Windsor. The issues during this phase of the Baronial wars were the possession of London and the position of the Barons in relation to the Crown.

The Reformation

A concise summary of the Reformation is found in "A Reformation Sunday Message" by the Rev. Floyd E. Brown:

In his biography of Martin Luther, entitled "Here I Stand," Roland Bainton makes the observation that the Protestant Reformation was like a man climbing in the inky darkness of the stairway of an ancient cathedral, and in the blackness he reaches out a hand to steady himself and finds that his hand has caught hold of a rope. And he is startled to hear, at the end of the rope, the loud clanging of a bell.

You remember how it happened. It was All Saints Eve in the year 1517. A young Augustinian monk . . . with conscience outraged at a church which had been blatantly corrupt, which had usurped the authority of individual conscience, which had abused the very essence of the Christian faith . . . nailed to the Cathedral door at Wittenberg ninety-five propositions for debate . . . theses which struck at the very heart of that ancient church.

And even though Martin Luther had no intention of starting any new movement in the life of the church, within a very few weeks his action was applauded throughout the land . . . for men everywhere had heard the ringing of that bell! It has been ringing now for more than four hundred years, until today there are hundreds of millions of Christian believers of Protestant persuasion.

In essence, the Protestant Reformation was a reaction against the misrepresentation of the Christian faith by the medieval church. It all began in the soul of an outraged Augustinian monk who for years had sought a personal encounter with his God by rigidly disciplining his body, by the mortification of his flesh, and by giving himself to a meticulous observance of the precepts of his church. But in all this his soul remained barren and he was beset with spiritual dissatisfaction.

But as he read his Bible the truth of God began to catch hold, until one day he came upon a truth in Paul's letter to the Romans that completely revolutionized his entire outlook. For there on the pages of the Scripture he read and understood "that the just shall live by faith" . . . that man's relationship to God in Christ was a personal spiritual experience, not at all dependent on what you did, but rather on what you were. And from its very inception the Protestant Reformation insisted that every man have the right of private judgment in matters spiritual; that every man have the privilege of reading God's Word and of interpreting it as the Holy Spirit illumined his understanding; that every man seek his God in a personal redeeming encounter with Jesus Christ.

When speaking of the Reformation in England people sometimes express the opinion that it would never have come about if Henry VIII had not wanted another wife. Certainly Henry's affairs and his desire for a male heir became entangled with anti-Papal sentiments, but it was by no means the beginning of the Reformation in England. One is tempted to say that the English Reformation was part of an intellectual and religious unrest that smouldered in several parts of Europe. We need only count the names of Huss, Calvin, Zwingli, Luther and Knox to show that it was widespread; but England had its own problem long before the Renaissance, a state of development which brought the Reformation into being through the promotion of individual discovery. Actually the seeds of England's own conflict in religion are to be found in her age-old quarrel with France.

Edward III, on the advice of Parliament, assumed the title of King of France, and war broke out anew in 1369. The antagonism was of the same type as that which had continued from 1351 to 1366. In 1305 the Pope resided at Avignon and, although Avignon was not considered a legal part of France, there was no doubt whatever that the King of France had control of it. While the Papacy suffered its removal from Rome, the English looked upon it as a tool for French politics. Meanwhile the Papal Court gave itself more and more to luxury and vice, and the cost of its wordly pleasures seemed to be coming from English coffers.

There was a system of provisions whereby the Pope might appoint his nominees to English benefices and expect that these benefices would be held by his appointees to the exclusion of other patrons. In 1351 the Statute of Provisions attempted to put an end to this system but, not being successful, it had to be re-enacted several years later. In 1353 the Praemunire Statute was passed, in which an attempt was made to stop suits from being carried to foreign courts. The Statute was aimed at the action of the Papal Court at Avignon. Finally the Popes were claiming that England owed them 1,000 marks a year, and this was a symbol of King John's vassalage and a burden of dishonor. Since 1333 Edward had had the government in his own hands and the payment had not been made. In 1366 Parliament declared that such payment would not be made.

Meanwhile John of Gaunt, time-honored Lancastrian, was siding with those who protested against the wealth of the clergy and the corruption of some of them. The most popular writer of that period, Geoffrey Chaucer, shows us contemporary vignettes of the less admirable sort of churchman: the fun-loving sportsman, nominally a monk; the greasy friar, who will do anything for money; the pardoner, who sells indulgences and the allegedly miraculous relics of the saints, the actuality of which, as well as their miraculous nature, being equally suspicious; the summoner, who brings the erring up before the Ecclesiastical Court. All these conditions of church people are possible only in a system that has so deteriorated that any sort of vicious or lazy person may be found among the lesser lights. There are, of course, a hard-working and penniless parson, a witty priest and the sweet, childlike prioress.

Against such abuses the voice of John Wycliffe was heard crying. He had been a distinguished doctor at Oxford, and it was he who attracted the Duke of Lancaster's attention, through his argument against the Pope's claim to King John's feudal levy. In 1374 he went to Bruges to argue about provisions with Papal representatives and, in 1376, proposed to issue a book, On Civil Leadership, in which he maintained that, by altering feudal law somewhat, one could validly say that all men held their possessions in feoff from God. At the end of tenure mortal vassal may justly say, "All things come of Thee, O Lord, and of Thine own have we given Thee." Thus dominion is founded on grace, and the continuance of man's right to his possessions depends upon his remaining in a state of grace.

In 1378 the Papacy divided and, for nearly a century and a half from that date, there were two Popes, one at Avignon and one at Rome. By now Wycliffe's respect for the Papacy was considerably less than it had been in the days of a single Pope. Wycliffe was now devoting himself to a translation of the Bible into English, "that might be understanded of the people." He was also busy heading his evangelistic program, which sent the "poor priests" about England preaching the Gospel to those who had no knowledge of Latin; and thus Wycliffe was led into controversy with the priesthood. His "poor priests" had seen much clerical pretension, and Wycliffe and his followers began to question the doctrines on which their authorities were based.

By 1381 Wycliffe had stated his disbelief in the doctrine of transubstantiation, declaring that priests could not "make the body of Christ," a power which priests had claimed. By tearing at the very heart of established dogma, he took the chance of losing many of his followers.

Twenty years later matters had not improved. The clergy demanded more and more power. Ecclesiastical courts could name a heretic, but had no power to burn him. In England, Wycliffe died a natural death. On the Continent, John Huss went through the flames to his death. The House of Lords was filled with bishops and abbots. The House of Commons still envied the wealth of the Church, and had no sympathy with heresy. The statute for the burning of heretics, De heretico Comburendo, ushered in what little-feeling England had in common with the Inquisition of the Mediterranean nations. The first victim was William Sawtre, a priest who saw no change in the bread at Mass. He was burned before the law was even enacted.

The year 1413 saw Henry V no longer the "Madcap Hal" but a responsible statesman, turning his thoughts toward the religion of his forefathers. He founded three friaries, and set out to crush the Wycliffe Lollards who preached against transubstantiation, auricular confession, the use of images, the selling—and sometimes the issuance of indulgences—and all in the speech of the laboring man. The Lollards claimed as their chief supporter Sir John Oldcastle, who bore the title of Lord Cobham in right of his wife. He was brought up before Archbishop Arundel. The Archbishop quietly asserted the necessity of preserving the traditional teaching. Oldcastle, equally calm, mentioned the falsity of its oldest doctrines. He was excommunicated, but little else happened, for Sir John Oldcastle silently disappeared. Meanwhile his followers, becoming enraged, plotted against the King's life and, early in 1414, there was a skirmish in St. Giles Fields, in which Henry's men assailed the rebels. Many escaped, but those who did not were burned or hanged; and another statute was formed, advocating harsher treatment of Lollardry, a name which denotes the tares (Latin: lolium) in the Church's wheat, which they considered themselves to be.

By the middle of the 15th Century ecclesiastical power had been considerably weakened through the race for power with France, and the constant erosion of the Wars of the Roses. Lollardry had faded with the death of Sir John Oldcastle, for that knight was publicly executed. The services of the Church were performed without the fervor that had filled them in the 13th Century. Chivalry was practically dead; that which remained of it was a romantic curiosity. The skies were glowing with the embers that were to flare up and become the Renaissance.

The next step was the climax of the Reformation, the reign of Henry VIII. From then until the beheading of Charles, England was to remain a cauldron of boiling religious controversy; and many a devout person was to go to the stake or block under Henry and, for opposing reasons, under Mary. As we have seen, Henry did not instigate the Reformation, but it was useful in allowing him to live as he wished. By the time Henry came to the throne the Renaissance spirit was a growing reality. In Italy it had been well under way for more than two centuries, even though in Italy the scholars held Christianity in contempt. In England there was no such breach. The English intellectual tried to revise his old faith in the light of contemporary ideas. Of the new reformers of the Universities, Thomas More is the most remarkable. He had hoped for great improvements under Henry, but was disillusioned when the King proceeded to become involved in war with France. Henry could brook no challenge to his will, but he overlooked people who did no more than disagree with him. He enjoyed the society of well educated men and urged More to take office under him. More refused for a time but, in 1518, feeling that Henry might accept his ideas, he became Sir Thomas More, Privy Councillor.

While More combined the Renaissance interest in humanity with a reverence for God and strove to mellow the older religious teaching, others threw off all religious restraint, and turned their thoughts to selfish enjoyment, or perhaps the pure refinement of their intellects. In Italy the Popes were victims of the era. Alexander VI indulged in the most flagrant of vice, and helped make the name of Borgia a shameful one for all time. Julius II became a temporal conqueror. Leo X was a connoisseur of art, but cared nothing for the ways of the soul. It was he who linked the spirit of Renaissance art with the House of the Medici, from which he came. The Papacy, he held, should be enjoyed to the fullest by those who were so fortunate as to have that post and, with this attitude so outspokenly stated, the Popes became no better and no worse than other powerful Renaissance princes.

Meanwhile Wolsey, the Chancellor, deplored the Church for more practical reasons, notably the large number of uneducated men in the clergy. With the consent of the King and the Pope he started the dissolution of several monasteries in 1524, and used the money thus obtained to found two great colleges, one at Oxford and one at Ipswich. Henry, sympathizing, went so far as to accept no authority other than God. "We are by God's grace King of England," he said, "and have no superior but God. We will maintain the rights of the Crown like our predecessors; your decrees you break and interpret at your pleasure, but we will not consent to your interpretations of them any more than our predecessors have done." Had the King been in the position of Henry II, he would at once have made a split with the Church; but Leo X was too much of this world, and did not let Henry's bluster and threats disturb him.

A religious revolution soon sprang up in Germany, drawing Henry and the Pope together. A Saxon friar, one Martin Luther, see elsewhere, was an eloquent preacher of morality, and the proponent of a doctrine which had long been laid aside. Justification by faith was his principal tenet. Luther taught the importance of individual faith, of man's personal relationship with God, and the nonimportance of the intervention of human beings between man and God. Luther's doctrine touched all human activity and breathed the spirit of political as well as religious liberty.

Henry wrote a book denouncing Luther, for Henry prided himself on his knowledge of theology, and thus wrote, defending the seven sacraments. Since Luther was antagonistic to royalty, he answered Henry with scurrilous invective. The Pope was overjoyed. Henry was an influential champion and, for his pains, was awarded the title "Defender of the Faith." Had Henry been moved by a motive weaker than controversial vanity, he would have been secure in the Pope's approval until the end of his life.

Henry, however, desired a son, for he had no surviving male heir. He wondered if he might rid himself of his present queen with the plea that marriage with his brother's wife was unlawful. Catharine of Aragon was five years his senior, and he was tiring of her. In 1511 he had, in his diatribe against Luther, assigned a divine origin to the Papacy, but had told More the secret reason for the pronouncement: possibly because he might move the Pope to grant him a divorce, particularly if he could prove that it might mean a peaceful succession. In 1555 he became more eager for the divorce, for it was then that he met a beautiful sixteen year old girl named Anne Boleyn. Since Anne would have nothing to do with him outside the bounds of marriage, Henry set his heart on divorce. Wolsey tried to make him abandon the project, foreseeing many complications; but no one could gainsay Henry, and Wolsey went about carrying out his master's instructions, though not with any joy. Suffice it to say that morals were the least of Wolsey's concern, but he did hold a strong political objection, for England was in danger of losing her alliance with Catharine's nephew, Emperor Charles V, if the divorce were accomplished. By now, the furor had become hopelessly entangled with Henry's political and personal commitments.

In 1532 the Commons set upon the Clergy, and Henry was behind them. The outcome was that he forced Convocation (Canterbury) to sign a document called the Submission of the Clergy, which simply meant that the officials of the Church could make no decision and act upon it without the King's permission. He now had the Clergy in such a position that it was impossible for them to protest against the divorce. Through this action Henry lost the best of his statesmen. Thomas More had been appointed Chancellor, as a replacement for Wolsey, in 1529. His Utopia had been written before Luther had made his break with the Papacy. When More took office he soon learned the extent to which his tolerance would have to be strained. Protestantism, as the Lutheran teaching was now called, had just begun to penetrate England, and was espoused by a handful of individuals. Certain persons who had not been satisfied with reasons already provided for the workings of the universe, turned to the teachings of justification by faith, while some of their comrades fell to berating the Clergy. Some few merely reviled the common creed of most Englishmen, and justification by faith led to a doubting of the merit of good works and even to a scornful contempt for them.

More could not bear the bitterness of this turn of events. He tormented the critics with argument and ridicule, and used his authority to back the Clergy in stamping out heresy. He did not have grounds to fear that the King's increased authority would bring on a true revolt, for he knew Henry to be a typical man of the times, with no liking for heresy. But More could foresee that Henry's layman's mind might not always keep the faith of his fathers in sight. The ideas of the age were seething, and the current was strong. To men like More, only the Papacy would have the strength to withstand change. Henry had not attacked yet, but attack was soon to come and, in 1532, More retired rather than be involved in the coming revolution.

It was now time for Henry to take direct steps with the Papacy, and his efforts found success for, by the end of 1532, Parliament had issued the Act of Annates. Annates were the first year's income of ecclesiastical benefices. This Act decreed that Annates paid to the Pope were to be kept back, but the Act was not to be enforced until the King had ratified it. This Henry did not do, hoping to threaten Pope Clement financially and keep him in suspense. But Pope Clement was not to be moved. Henry could wait no longer, and was secretly married to Anne Boleyn, 25 January 1533. He resolved to put an end to Papal jurisdiction so that he could declare his former marriage null and void. If England were still bound to the Papacy, the injured wife could appeal to the Papal court. Thus came about the Act of Appeals, which declared the King to be the supreme authority in England. All temporal matters were to be decided by temporal judges, and spiritual matters by spiritual judges, but no appeals should be suffered to any authority outside the realm.

A convenient tool for Henry's national policy was found in Thomas Cranmer, whom the King had appointed Archbishop of Canterbury in the Spring of 1533. Cranmer was intellectually acute but morally weak, and was prone to ride with Henry's will. He had been active in Henry's divorce proceedings. In March he was half driven, half persuaded, to declare Catharine's marriage to be void and, in May, in the Archepiscopal court of Dunstable, he pronounced sentence against her. In accordance with the Act of Appeals the sentence was final. To forestall any move Catharine might make, Henry and Cranmer kept from her the exact day when the sentence would be given. The temporal benefits the Pope derived from England were at an end, as well as his spiritual jurisdiction. In July the Act of Annates was ratified by Henry VIII.

The teachings of Zwingli, the Swiss reformer, spurred on the desire for stronger measures against heretics, for the Swiss preacher held that the sacramental bread and wine were merely symbolic. Amongst the persecuted was John Frith. He denied any belief in the doctrine of transubstantiation. He was burned at the stake.

Hugh Latimer, the King's favorite chaplain, tended to test things by their moral worth, rather than by conformity to an intellectual standard. Pilgrimages, worship of saints and the idea of Purgatory seemed immoral to him, but his wish was to purify opinion, not to change it. He had the King's support, for he was made Bishop of Worcester in 1535.

On a wider scale the Reformation may thus be summed up. It was far more than a matter of English power politics. First of all, the Papacy was dangerously weakened during the Babylonian Captivity. The Renaissance Popes became so worldly that they were known as the secular Popes. There were altogether too many appointments to the Roman curia, leading to bribery and to the sale of bishoprics and other offices, an offense known as simony, all of which became an offense to temporal princes. Some bishops were more secular than spiritual and were in active conflict with the Papacy. Many of the regular parish priests were ignorant and unfit for spiritual leadership in an increasingly progressive society. The wealth of big monastic estates aroused envy in the hearts of secular leaders and, in England and Germany, these had no scruples against seizing them and breaking them up. Many Christians regarded only the empty form of their worship. Greater ambitions were aroused in new monarchies. Democratic sentiments were flowering in the ruins of the Middle Ages. Democratic forces aligned themselves with new monarchies to overthrow feudal lords and check Papal power. Rediscovery of classical culture nourished neo-paganism, while geographical discoveries increased materialism, and many other factors entered in to make man assert himself—to explore rather than to accept, to appeal to the God who had made him as well as all mankind.

The sale of indulgences was a prime scandal. An indulgence technically is "the commission of temporal punishment due to sin after its guilt has been forgiven, which the Church grants from the treasury of the merits of Christ and His saints." (See New Catholic Dictionary). These spiritual benefits were sold on a wholesale scale throughout Europe and particularly in Germany. Pope Leo X was encouraging new ornamentation on St. Peter's basilica, and granted the privilege of selling indulgences to bishops on a percentage basis. Some bishops needed money to maintain armies and courts. Sales of indulgences took place in the manner of a public auction on the streets, agents peddling them and selling them for whatever they would bring. Pious men were heartbroken to see the faith thus degraded, and business people were angered at seeing so much money going to Rome and being drained from so many communities.

In the England of the 16th Century horror had been spread by tales of the Inquisition. To many the Roman Church symbolized a system in which children informed against parents, according to which arrests were made on the grounds of spite, and torture or execution were common with scarcely more than a mock trial, after an admission of guilt had been extracted under pressure.

Science enters the picture, presenting the sharpened eyes and ears of investigation and research. Science requires liberty for these pursuits, and the scientific spirit opposes the idea of "revelation" in its most rigid sense. Science does not mix with the supernatural. Its only authorty is the desire for truth.

Finally, the Bible had been translated into the vulgar tongue. It was studied in the original. Texts were compared and studied. Textual criticism was injected to oppose the accepted theory of a supernatural and infallible document. Now that a man was learned enough to read and could make out and interpret most of the Bible for himself in his native language, authority was losing even more ground.

The church officials were corrupt. Justice under the Inquisition had been cruelly parodied. Mental expansion had caused Englishmen to rise to a vigour which would no longer tolerate such degradations, such unfairness. The time had come when Englishmen, fired with the enthusiasm for geographic and scientific discovery, would assert themselves. Henry's private desires and political fears brought about the first real rift between England and Rome, but the English Reformation had not been kindled simply by a monarch's desire for a new wife, nor was the desire for a new wife merely a manifestation of royal lust.

It is obvious that there had been political and religious dissatisfaction with Rome for two centuries before Henry's time, and in Europe the Albigenses had suffered even earlier. Unrest in England grew and diminished over the years, but with each new outburst the feeling had been more intense and reprisals more severe. Monasteries were to be looted for the national treasury, and there was more to come after the initial first step of Henry's reign. Henry's Litany, written in the English vernacular, was to become the nucleus for Edward's Prayer Book. Tyndal and Coverdale were to translate the Bible, and Tyndal was to become a martyr to the cause. There was to be controversy over the distribution of the Bible, for in the hands of radicals it might become a dangerous weapon, at least the cause of many a bitter dispute. Then Mary's reign would come, glowing with blazing faggots, and hideous with the stake, block, whipping post, stocks and gyves with which the defeated party tried to coerce men back to the fold in the name of God. And indeed these brutalities set the seal on English religious independence. Nothing could have turned away the populace so forcibly as threats and torture. England had feared the possibility of an Inquisition, and now with the actual appearance of Inquisitorial cruelty and the threat of the overlordship of a rival seapower, men turned their backs on doctrine dictated from a foreign country on religion associated only with barbarity, and on their half-Spanish Queen and her cold Spanish consort.

Henry did not upset the religious and political structure of his kingdom solely for Anne Boleyn. It was his seriousness of purpose in his desire for an heir that caused him to raise such a tempest in his domestic life, and with both Church and State. The fact that his choice of another wife caused turmoil that set the pace for England and everyone influenced by her from that day is not denied, but that fact is but a portion of the picture. England's future did not rest upon Henry's whim. The sweep of two hundred years' growth made it easier for Henry to perform an act, personal by nature, for a national reason. Yet detractors of English Protestantism will, in the future, as they have in the past, say that the English Reformation was the result of Henry's encounter with a pretty Lady in Waiting.

MARTIN LUTHER

MARTIN LUTHER

Born at Eisleben, Lower Saxony, 10 November 1483, Luther discovered about 1503 in the Library of the University of Erfurt a Latin Bible, and found to his no small delight that it contained more than the excerpts in common use. (The clergymen of that time knew only the Gospels and Epistles.) In 1505 he entered the Monastery of the Augustines at Erfurt. In 1507 he was consecrated priest, and in 1508 was made Professor of Philosophy in the new University of Wittenberg.

In 1510 he visited the Court of Pope Leo X at Rome, on business connected with the Order. This journey revealed to him the irreligion and corruption of the clergy at Rome, and destroyed his reverence for the sanctity of the Pope.

He became a preacher at Wittenberg, and in 1512 was made a Doctor in Theology. His profound learning, together with the fame of his eloquence, soon made Luther known to the principal scholars and esteemed as a powerful advocate of the new light which was breaking upon the world. Great, therefore, was the attention excited by his ninety-five propositions given to the world 31 October 1517, and intended to put an end to indulgences by the Dominican Tetzel. His propositions were condemned as heretical as soon as they appeared.

In 1520 Luther and his friends were excommunicated. His writings were burned in Rome, Cologne and Louvain. Indignant at this open act of hostility (after his modest letter in which he had shown himself desirous of reconciliation, declared his submission to the Pope, and advised a reform in the Church). Luther burned the bull of excommunication and the decretals of the Papal canon at Wittenberg 10 December 1520. By this act he dissolved all connection with the Pope and the Roman Church. A few months later he was summoned by the newly elected German Emperor, Charles V, before the Diet of Worms and resolved to go in spite of all the remonstrances of his friends. Before the Emperor, the Archduke Ferdinand, six electors, twenty-four dukes, seven margraves, thirty bishops and prelates, and many princes, counts, lords and ambassadors, Luther left Worms, a conqueror; but it was so manifest that his enemies were determined on his destruction that Frederick the Wise conveyed him privately to Wartburg to save his life.

Neither the Emperor nor the Pope could disturb him in his retirement, of which he took advantage to translate the New Testament into German. This retirement lasted only ten months. When informed of the disturbances excited by Carlstadt on the subject of images he could no longer endure restraint. He hastened to Wittenberg, and the sermons, which he delivered for eight successive days after his return, in March 1522, to quell the violence of the enraged insurgents in Wittenberg, are patterns of moderation and wisdom and popular eloquence.

Amidst these disputes and attacks his plans were matured for a total reformation in the Church, which was called for by the voice of the nation. In 1523 at Wittenberg, he began to purify the liturgy from its empty forms and, by laying aside his cowl in 1524, he gave the signal for the abolition of the monasteries and the better application of the goods of the Church.

Against his will his adherents styled themselves Lutherans and engaged in a war which broke out immediately after his death and desolated Germany. As long as he lived Luther was for peace, and he succeeded in maintaining it. He regarded it as impious to seek to establish the cause of God by force; and during thirty years of his life the principles of the Reformation gained a firmer footing and were more widely propagated by his unshaken faith and unwearied endeavor than by all the wars, treaties and councils.

Luther, in company, was always lively and abounded in sallies, wit and good humor, preserved in his "Tabletalks." He wrote hymns: Ein Feste Burg. A Mighty Fortress Is Our God. His fondness for music: he sang and relaxed playing on the flute and lute. He spent some hours each day in meditation and prayer and was always accessible to visitors.

In 1525 Luther married an abbess, who had left her convent, Katharina von Bora, whom he dearly loved. They had six children, two of whom died at an early age. He died at Eisleben, 18 February 1546, in his sixty-third year, and was buried in the Castle Church of Wittenberg. His wife died in 1552.

Luther completed for the people of Germany the translation of the whole Bible, with some assistance from Melanchthon and other friends, and thus rendered his name immortal. From 1526 to 1529 he prepared a new church service agreeable to the Gospel under the patronage of the Elector and with the aid of Melanchthon and other members of the Saxon Church. His larger and shorter Catechisms, to be used in schools, were also of great service.

CALVIN

John Calvin the second great Reformer, was born at Noyon, Picardy, 10 July 1509, and died 27 May 1564, at the age of 55 years. He married at Strasburg in 1539 a widow, Idelette de Burie. They had one son who died early in life. His wife died in 1549.

John Calvin had a sister, Catharine Calvin, who married William Whittingham of the City of Chester, a Puritan who fled from England to the Continent during the reign of Queen Mary and became pastor of the first Congregational Church at Geneva, where the wedding took place. They were the great, great grandparents of Martha Whittingham, who married in 1691 the Rev. John Rogers, a descendant of John Rogers the Martyr, ancestors of many representative American families.

John Calvin's chief doctrines were: predestination; particular redemption; total depravity; irresistible grace; and the certain perseverance of the saints.

The followers of Calvin in Germany are called the Reformed. In France most Protestants are Calvinists. Calvinism is the professed belief of the greatest part of the Presbyterians, the Particular Baptists in England and India (1937) and the Associated Baptists in America, the Independents of every class in England and Scotland and the Congregationalists of New England. Wesley in England was Arminian and Whitfield was Calvanistic.

In Scotland, John Knox joined the Protestant party and preached in Dundee, Perth and St. Andrews, and St. Giles, Edinburgh.

In Ireland for various reasons the Reformation never made much progress.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS

"Our Hope," January 1946, Vol. 52, No. 7, makes the following interesting contribution to the Reformation story:

Gustavus Adolphus, the pious King of Sweden, was used under God in saving the Reformation from complete ruin. Says an historian, "So far as the human eye can see, the Reformation, except for Gustavus Adolphus, would have been crushed in Germany, and probably in all northern Europe with the exception of England." It was during the Thirty Years' War. Romish machinations under Jesuitical leadership were threatening the very life of the Protestant faith. Wallenstein was in the field, the Austrian Romish leader. Then the King of Sweden appeared upon the scene and descended upon Germany with a well-trained army. In less than two years he turned the tide, until, on the plains of Lutzen, 16 November 1632, he crowned a heroic life by a heroic death, with these words on his lips, "I am the King of Sweden, and seal with my blood the liberty and religion of the whole German nation."

Before the battle in which he gave his life, when Wallenstein's forces were gathering to attack, the King commanded Luther's immortal hymn, "A Mighty Fortress is Our God," to be sung. This was followed by a battle hymn which he had composed himself, the text of which we give below. Then he led a prayer for victory and gave the battle cry, "God with us."

Fear not, O little flock, the foe who madly seeks your overthrow;
Dread not his rage and power!
What though your courage sometimes faints, his seeming triumph o'er God's saints lasts but a little hour.
Be of good cheer, your cause belongs to Him Who can avenge your wrongs, Leave it to Him, our Lord.
Though hidden yet from all our eyes, He sees the Gideon who shall rise,
To save us and His Word.
As true as God's own Word is true, nor earth nor hell with all their creeds Against us shall prevail.
A jest and by-word are they grown; our God is with Us, we His own—
Our victory cannot fail.
Amen Lord Jesus, grant our prayer; Great Captain,
Now Thine arm make bare—
Fight for us once again.
So shall Thy Saints and martyrs raise a mighty Chorus to Thy praise, World without end, Amen.

CHAPTER 264

Who Wrote Magna Charta?

Often the question is asked: Who wrote Magna Charta? Before we answer, let us in turn ask how this is to be construed. Are they asking who penned it? Do they mean who planned it? Are they looking for an author? The Declaration of Independence was written by Thomas Jefferson. The literary style has been marked as his. He was the spokesman for its organization. If we look behind the typical prose of the times we may see, or imagine we see, the imprint of a personality. Truly the Declaration is an august work of prose and worthy to be remembered for the dignity of its cadence. It is for these reasons that phrases of it haunt our subconscious memories. Can we observe the Great Charter in such a fashion?

The answer is yes, but we shall not see the same sort of performance. Times had changed between the final framing of these two documents. The Middle Ages set no great store by authorship per se or personalities behind the news. It is assumed that twenty-five copies of Magna Charta were originally written, and by hand. They were not engraved as were the Declaration and the Constitution. Four sealed copies of Magna Charta are preserved—two in the collection of Robert Cotton, and one of these discovered in Dover Castle was badly damaged by the Cottonian fire. The third copy remains at Salisbury Cathedral where it has stayed from the first. The fourth and best preserved is the Lincoln copy.

As we have been told many times before, the Charter is contained on a single sheepskin or parchment, measuring seventeen and a half by eighteen inches. Its surface appears shriveled and darkened, but the writing is still clear, whatever the original composition of the ink —nut-gall or cuttlefish dye (sepia). On this one parchment there are some 3000 words, the average for a terse magazine story. The words are cut down to half their size. Latin case endings have been dropped. Abbreviations have been made with the aid of symbols denoting the syllables omitted. Some words have been run together. It will be noted too that the document has been started in a big bold hand, and that the writing gets smaller and smaller as the scribe tried to squeeze in just one more word at the end of the line or to sandwich in that last syllable so that the word would not have to be broken. It is a long trip for the eye, from the right-hand edge back to the left-hand edge and the beginning of the next line.

Watch also the way the hand changes and turns at times to a scrawling cursive. The hand was getting cramped and tired. The quill pen needed trimming with a pen knife. The light from sputtering torches or a candle was dim indeed. There's much weariness in this writing, and it was done quickly as twenty-five copies had to be on hand. Though the initial maneuver had been previously thought out, John had been trapped and the scriptorium had to have the document written out so that the heralds in the halls and the priests in the abbeys could intone the endless rise and fall of the periods, stopping only for breath. When such a pause was made, we come to the end of a sentence, a full stop and a renewal with a capital letter exactly as in modern usage. Where there is a new division, an item, or where modern editors number a special provision, the reader-scribe takes no notice of the break if it starts with a relative pronoun or a pronoun introducing a subjunctive.

We note that the beginning of Article I, "Quod Anglicana Ecclesia libera sit" (that the English Church shall be Free) is run in with the preceding sentence. The writer, feeling that there was no such break here, wrote it as he would have read it aloud and doubtless muttered each word as he wrote it. Indeed, so prevalent was this practice that rules are found for scriptoria, telling the monks to read softly lest the combined mumbling of a whole writing workshop get on the nerves of serious scholars. As for the dropping of case endings, medieval imagination provided an imp who gathered up all the case endings dropped by a priest at Mass. These were placed in one big hamper and the load was used to weight the scales against him on the Day of Judgment. We trust that the writer of Magna Charta has been forgiven his lost endings, that every Article might be included.

When John was asked to review the Charter, we can be sure that it was not quite the same document as the one we now know. The Barons presented him with some sort of written piece which was later revised. After receiving John's imprint, the whole thing was drawn up into a formal charter. There was a document submitted to John, drawn up by Langton and Pembroke, but it seems likely that John approved of little or none of it, and by this time it was too late for it to matter much what he thought about it. The differences between Magna Charta and this earlier document rest only in minute details.

Of course King John did not sign the document by spelling out his name; he sealed it with hot wax, and the print, "data per manum nostram," not for the sake of custom as Barrington says, but because he and his courtiers could neither read nor write.

The Seal itself is a matter of some interest. It seems that in 1212 the Great Seal was not always in constant attendance upon the King, and charters are known to have been issued at Westminster while the King was wandering about the realm. Apparently witnesses had to swear that they were present when a document was sealed in the King's absence. For his periods of travel John used the Privy Seal to seal letters, instructing the keeper at Westminster to apply the Great Seal to certain other important documents. He had reason to believe that there were conspiracies against him. Fearing that the Great Seal might get into the wrong hands, he devised complicated countersigns included in letters, ordering certain courses of action known only to himself and to the recipient (such as the showing of a certain ring) to show that his message and his alone had been received. It sounds childish, this method of registered delivery, but "uneasy lies the head that wears a crown."

We can see, therefore, behind the nervous script of Magna Charta, signs of human beings at work. Who were they? Was it one of the Barons who wrote this noble Latin "Concessimus etiam omnibus liberis hominibus regni nostri, pro nobis et haeredibus nostris in perpetuum, omnes libertates subscriptas, habendas et tenandas eis et haeredibus suis de nobis et haeredibus nostris?" Was this written by even an illiterate Baron, who being learned only in war, could read at the most the set phrases of legal documents, or the cliches of religious literature, whose spoken tongue was French with a modicum of English for the servants? Could such a man write, and to what extent? Would he know the rigid medieval laws of rhetoric? The only scholar present was Richard de Gilpin, secretary to Ivo de Tailboys, Baron of Kendal. He might have written Magna Charta, possibly having it dictated somewhere in his lord's manor to a group of clerks summoned for the purpose. We have no proof of this at all. Perhaps de Gilpin had nothing whatever to do with it. Since Langton was a powerful churchman and a principal instigator of the Baronial cause, it would seem likely that he would have been able to hand the work over to a nearby monastery. At the last minute twenty-five copies could be turned out at his command, provided there were a sufficient number of scriveners at hand, but without the illumination or the uniformity of lettering so lovingly worked over in the great religious works, for this was a rush order. It would certainly have been an easily available service to the prelate. Perhaps de Gilpin was a consultant, perhaps not; we are never told.

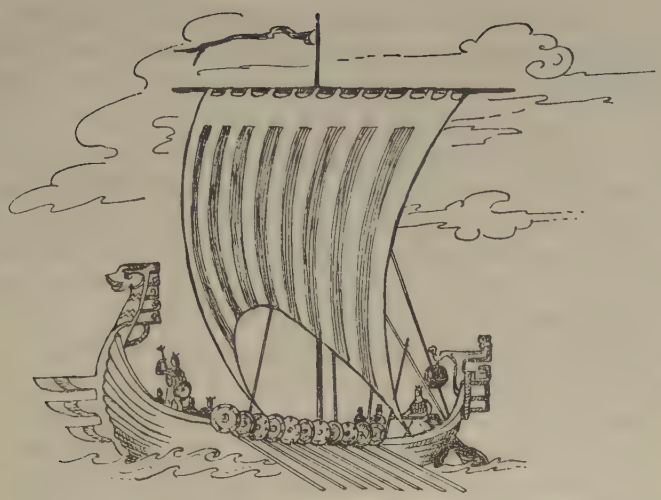
Although our history books say very little about Magna Charta as a piece of writing, it is worth considering. Let us look again at the parchment which hangs "brown, shriveled and torn in the British Museum," and think of the feverish fingers in the late spring of 1215 as they scratched their shorthand, "Johannes dei Gra Rex Angl Dos Hybrn Dux Norman Aquit, etc." Even the abbreviation marks are impatiently dashed in. They are omitted from the above because they are not easily reproduced in modern print. The phrase reads, of course, "Johannes dei Gratis, Rex Angliae, Dominus Hiberniae, Dux Normanniae et Aquitaniae," (John by the Grace of God, King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Normandy and of Aquitaine) referring to the first English King to use the "Royal We," for up to the time of King John the King referred to himself in the singular, even in official documents. The more we scrutinize the actual writing, the more we may conjecture, and perhaps with a measure of validity.



VIKING SHIP

The Vikings

The great Age of the Vikings is usually set as beginning with the first recorded appearance of a Norse pirate fleet in A. D. 789, and the settlement of the Northmen in Normandy, according to the treaty of St. Claire-Sur-Epte in 911/12. Previous to that date large numbers of Northmen had been driven out of Ireland, and England had called an uneasy truce, by signing over a large portion of the Island to the invaders at the peace of Wedmore, in 878. This Viking Age occurred simultaneously with the migrations and subsequent wars throughout Northern Europe and Asia. Whether the wandering tribes were moved by over-population or over-grazing, it is hard to say, but when forces in what are now Russia and Mongolia pushed forward into Europe, the Scandinavians were forced to seek other homes. It was an Age of universal unrest, part of the same pattern which, many Centuries before, had led to the break-up of the Roman Empire. It was a prolonged period of movement and thrust, called by some scholars Folk-Wanderings.

In 789, on the Dorset coast of England, three pirate ships landed, claiming to have come from Haerethland. The pirates killed the harbormaster, and sailed off with a load of plunder. Other such marauders appeared in 793 off Northumberland and attacked the Monastery of Lindisfarne. Jarrow was raided, Glamorganshire in Wales, the Islands of Man and Iona. After 802 the worst raids were largely confined to Ireland and the Western coasts of Islands of Scotland.

Always there was a plan behind the invasions: First, periodic raids, then the capture of an island base or arsenal and, after ravaging the mainland, a final settling down and assimilation among the native peoples. After the Danes had settled in England, and after the peace of Wedmore, there were a few more raids, but such efforts were frustrated by King Alfred's ships. Then the Danes, under their two Kings, Godfred and Siegfried, laid waste the countries of the Rhinemouth and the lower Scheldt, and divided their forces. Some of them continued their destruction of Germany, and others ravaged Northern France. Then Normandy was settled, and in 1066 an army of assimilated Norsemen, imbued with the culture and religion of the Christian Franks, again entered and conquered England.

Terrible were the raids of the Vikings. So fierce were they that the Church incorporated in the regular service the prayer: "From the fury of the Northmen, deliver us." Yet when the Northmen actually settled in a land, they governed themselves in due accordance with a strict code of laws, and it is said that the Viking raids were one of the determining causes of the establishment of Feudalism. Feudalism is often traced back to the custom of blood-brotherhood, shared by many of the Germanic tribes. Each chieftain, by this system, was a blood-brother and leader to his men, each of whom, in their turn, had sworn blood-brotherhood to their fellows, for greater protection and group solidarity. If the Danes also practised the rites of blood-brotherhood, they too would have helped pave the way to the establishment of a system in which the leading Earls swore fealty to their King and, in turn, accepted the allegiance of other vassals.

As we progress in history we are justified in considering the expeditions of the Normans to be continuations of the sallies of the Northmen. The names are etymologically the same, and the people are also alike in descent. Both groups share in the old spirit of war and adventure, but the change of name signifies a deep change in historical position. The national character has suffered little change, but the Northern people have gained a new religion, a new language, a different code of laws, and a new social system. The effect of a settlement of Normans is vastly different from the effect of a settlement of Northmen. It is true that the Norse element in the Normans facilitated assimilation with people of an English and Danish background, but they did not have a language closely related to English as did the Danes; and their institutions were completely foreign. Far from feeling a kinship with the Danes in England, the Normans found that the hard core of resistance was largely Danish.

Somewhat later than the Danish conquests of England and Gaul came the Danish discovery and colonization of Greenland and Iceland. Eric the Red sailed from Iceland to Greenland in 985 and settled there. In 999 his son, Leif, set forth to the court of Olaf Tryggvason, King of Norway, and stopped on the way at the Hebrides. As he set out from Norway in 1000, the King commissioned him to proclaim Christianity in Greenland. On this voyage he was blown off course by bad weather and touched on the shores of North America, or Vinland, a land of which he had no knowledge. He took back with him "grapes," probably cranberries, the "selfsown" wheat which was, most likely, maize, and the bark and wood of the mösur, which scholars think was birch. These specimens he took back to his father's home in Brattahild or Ericsfiord, in Greenland. A later expedition is recorded in which Thorfinn Karlsefni came to the Western lands, accompanied by two Gaels, probably captured by Olaf Tryggvason. These men were swift runners, and were given to Leif because they had the makings of excellent scouts. Vinland was probably some part of Nova Scotia, perhaps seen by Biarni Haerilfson in 985. But Biarni never came ashore. Thorfinn, allegedly followed upon his trail, exploring Helluland, Markland, and Vinland where he decided to spend a winter.

Thorfinn was an explorer who went to Greenland and married there, his wife being the widow of Eric the Red's son Thorstein, named Gudrid. Thorfinn was greatly interested in founding a colony in Vinland. He took with him three ships, 160 men and some women, including Gudrid, and Freydis, Eric the Red's daughter.

Their route took them to Vesterbygd, or the "Western Settlement" of Greenland, Bear Island, and away to the South until they reached Helluland, probably Labrador, which took its name from the word Hellur, denoting slabs of rock. Two days later they reached the thickly forested Markland, meaning woodland, which might have been Newfoundland, and two days later they came to a cape where they found the remains of a ship, possibly the relic of an earlier Scandinavian explorer. The cape could have been Cape Breton or some nearby promontory, and its shores they called the wondrous beaches, "wonderstrands." After two days Thorfinn put his Gael runners ashore and told them to head Southward. When they returned they brought with them grapes and wild wheat, to show that they were near Vinland.

The fleet, now at anchor at Streamfiord, or the Firth of Currents, stayed for the winter (1003-1004) suffering Northern weather and hunger, and gaining no new knowledge of their Western promised land. In the Spring the mutinous Thorhall, Eric's huntsman, headed a band of nine men and sailed off to the North, with hope of working to the West and South, but bad weather drove them to Ireland and they were there enslaved. Thorfinn, meanwhile, forged Southward until he reached a place called Hop, at the mouth of a river flowing from a lake to the sea, which could have been one of the several estuaries near the Southernmost part of Nova Scotia. Here his group found wheat and vines enough to be assured that this was Vinland, and here they built their huts in 1004. Soon they were visited by natives, dark-skinned, flat-faced, with high cheekbones, large-eyed and dark-eyed, with ugly hair, who approached them in skin canoes. The following Spring brought the visitors back and Thorfinn and his company bartered with them. They were moved to panic by a bull belonging to the Northmen and returned in three weeks to fight. And so the Norse left Hop to the Eskimo, Heothuk, or Micmac Indians, whichever they were, and returned to Streamfiord. Thorfinn returned later to Hop for two months' visit, and then made a Northward trip in search of Thorhall. On this journey Thorwald Ericson was killed, apparently by a native arrow. Such are the stories told in the Red Eric Saga of three voyages, and in the elaborate account of six voyages in the Flatey Book.

A discovery can be made but once, and it was Leif Ericson who, with the Northmen, discovered North America and attempted to colonize it. Leif was the first to be recorded as having come upon the Western Hemisphere. Three hundred years later Columbus arrived in the Carribean, heralding the movement of European expansion toward both the American continents. We cannot be sure of Red Eric's or Thorfinn's landings. They have been cited from Labrador to Florida. It has also been rumored that the Vikings at some time visited the shores of Massachusetts and Rhode Island. Had Iceland been close to European trade centers, the exploits of these Northern seafarers would have had momentous consequences. As it was, they passed unnoticed.

In his article in the American Anthropologist, Arlington Mallery gives us the latest evidence to support the notion of Norse expeditions into territory now incorporated within the boundaries of the United States. The points he makes would seem to refute William Godfrey's statements of 1957, that there is no reason to believe that the Vikings were in any way responsible for the Newport Tower or were ever in that vicinity. Dr. Mallery shows that there was some evidence neglected by Godfrey when he claimed to have set down all theories pro and con, to that date, bearing on the pre-Columbian discovery of North America. Specifically, Dr. Mallery makes these three points:

1) The only specific and irrefutable evidence of the Viking explorations of the North American coastline are the navigation charts with their Old Icelandic place names. Two of these, differing mainly in their zero points, are correct charts, and one, the Friseo Chart shows the coast of Maine and Nova Scotia. A third chart shows all of Canada East of Great Bear Lake and the Slave River, omitting Nova Scotia and a part of Ontario. It includes, however, the Northern areas of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and New York. In addition to the sixty or more ancient sagas which speak of North American explorations along the Northern shoreline made by the Vikings, these charts surely should convince us that such discoveries included a major part of Canada and certain portions of the United States and Alaska, several hundred years before the voyage of Columbus.

2) There is some evidence of Viking contact with the North American mainland in the longhouses of the Iroquois which so closely resemble the Norse longhouses. Indeed, some are almost identical to the narrow Scandinavian structures built prior to A. D. 1200. Where wood was not available the Scandinavian buildings were of stone. Only in the Iroquois' constant use of wood do we see a difference. And in these observations we learn that the Norsemen did build stone buildings, even though most of the old Scandinavian churches in the Old World are built of wood. This means that the Newport Tower could date back to Viking days.

A continuous line of longhouses was noted stretching between the Gulf of the St. Lawrence to Lake Huron. Recently a few more were discovered in Newfoundland, completing the chain of Viking houses, which after 1200 were built in a long chain from the Baltic Sea to Lake Huron. There are two types represented, reflecting the development of the Scandinavian skala and indicating two periods of Viking migration to America: a movement into the country South of the St. Lawrence River prior to 1200 and a period exemplifying a type evolved by the Iroquois descendants of the Vikings. The Iroquois, it would seem, continued building skala as late as 1800. Among the Neutrals (sic), an Iroquoian tribe, buildings are found bearing towers resembling the Scandinavian skemma.

3) In 1730 a mining surveyor employed by the Royal Board of Iron Trade of Great Britain went to Sweden to examine the Enkieling iron smelting furnaces then in use. His drawings (1734) show that four furnaces found in the Deer Creek Valley of Ohio in 1949 and 1950 and the older Scandinavian ones are identical (Lost America 193c, 194a, 196aff, 216aff). It is obvious that the American Enkielings are of some antiquity, since they were completely buried within prehistoric Ohio mounds in areas previously undisturbed except by surface ploughing. Two iron shovels have also been found, one in an Enkieling furnace, and one in a hearth-pit furnace. It was found that the shovels had been made by cladding two carburized iron sheets together, the same process as that used in making a Viking axe excavated in Newfoundland.

Let us examine the evidence at Newport, Rhode Island, and see whether the stone Tower there could have been built by the Vikings. In Touro Park at Newport stands a squat, hollow Tower, a row of arches at its base, and an upper section missing. A picture made in 1740 shows that there has been no change in its appearance to this date. Many would like to feel that it is an actual Viking monument, but the majority of archeologists who have investigated it insist that such a notion is untenable, that it is pure romance. In the Will of ex-Governor Benedict Arnold (grandfather of the Revolutionary General) dated 1677, there is mention of "My Stone Built Wind-Miln" which he bequeaths to his daughter. Those favoring a Colonial origin for the structure have gladly accepted this as a possible identification. However, the Will does not state that Arnold erected the Tower himself, nor do we know of a document that claims he did. There is no reason why he could not have used a tower already built as a basis for the wooden superstructure that would support the four sails. It would have saved him much labor if he had. There is no absolute proof of this "Arnold Theory." There are no Viking potsherds or any artifacts to be found at the Tower's base, nor is there any reason to believe that remnants have not been there. The earth around the Tower has been disturbed many times since Colonial days when, from time to time, legends of private treasure hoards have sent treasure hunters to the vicinity. It is also possible that some important clues have been destroyed by the shovels, picks, and crowbars of those who dug for gold. There is any amount of debris to be found, in such amounts that archeologists have felt that the Tower rested on a dumping ground, but that fact proves nothing. Thus far evidence of the Arnold theory has been negative, and such evidence tells us only that we still know nothing. Because the archeologists who believe that the Tower was a local product have proved nothing, the few definite facts supporting a medieval date seem, by contrast, impressive. The facts supporting a medieval origin are these: first, artifacts, found on allegedly undisturbed ground, have been unearthed near stones which have been pried loose. Many of these articles could have belonged to the treasure hunters. Most of the fragments of glass and pottery have been found concentrated in one small area. It would be unusual for builders to leave all their relics in a spot comprising only one percent of the whole area in which they worked, but a treasure hunter, prodding at the spot supposedly marked by X, would be the more plausible owner.

Even if the "finds" had been dropped by treasure seekers, we still have no proof that this is a Viking tower. But then, we have no proof that it was built by the earliest settlers. It might be well to examine the base structures of a few representative English and Dutch windmills and see if the tower is in any way like them. Let us then turn to the positive evidence for an earlier dating.

More dramatic is the story told by the measurements themselves. Whoever built the Newport Tower used a unit of length unknown to the English Colonists, a unit which had been abandoned several centuries before. It will be found that the tower is circular, and that the columns are equidistant from a common center, that their circumferences are precise circles with equal diameters. One would expect all the diameters to be given in whole numbers. Yet this is far from the case. The diameters of all circles in the plan are fractional, an unlikely way in which to lay out a building, particularly one designed with an eye to aesthetic appeal. One would expect a certain inexactness in measurements used with rough stones, and an error of an inch or two would raise no criticism. An error of nine inches, however, in a distance of less than twenty-five feet is unbelievable. Measurements of the various diameters have been checked and rechecked, but do what we will, they are still capricious, and a different system of measurement tallies with the measurements of the Tower.

Obviously a measure different from the modern foot or yard was used. Our present yard varies about a hundredth of an inch from that used in 1490, in the reign of Henry VII, and another in 1588, in Elizabeth's time. This was the measure employed by our first settlers and nothing like the unit which is used as a base for the dimensions in the Tower. There was a common foot unit, in use in the Middle Ages and in Northern Europe, which was the Rhenish-Danish-Norwegian foot of 0.3139 meters or 12.35 English and American inches. And it is this foot which was used by the builders of the Newport Tower. Arithmetical experimentation shows that it is. Why should the early settlers use a measure differing from the common and legal measure in England? Could some of the Puritans have picked it up in Leyden? Why should they make their work difficult by using a foreign unit?

Another tangible bit of evidence is the remaining piece of a Catholic altar. There are grooves for a shelf along one wall. There seems to have been a table top attached to the wall, supported by corbels. The table top is 42 inches, not a suitable height for a household table and, under the top, about half way between the top and the ground, is a niche neatly finished, perfectly suited for the deposit of the Communion elements. It is not likely that a work bench would be fixed to the wall in the darkest portion of the room. The specifications for the structure exactly fit the description of an altar arranged for Catholic use. The aumbry beneath the top of the altar is quite usual. The blank wall could be used for a hanging or a crucifix, and the candles, at such a distance from the windows, would not be blown out. But there were no Catholics in the early years of the Newport Colony. In 1680 it was reported that none resided there.

Prior to 1632, Sir Edwin Plowden and his associates petitioned King Charles I for a patent of land, with headquarters somewhere near the East end of Long Island. In the petition is a list of existing resources within that tract of land and among them is named a large round stone tower. The tower was not on Long Island, and seems to have been at some distance on the mainland. How likely is it that there would have been two such towers? Has anyone found the foundation of so sturdy a building anywhere in that area? Something would have been left, overgrown and buried. No ploughshares have crumpled in the contact with a mysterious circular foundation. It is almost certainly the Newport Tower which is referred to, a facility which had been reported but not explained by someone who noted it earlier. The petition was granted in 1632, nearly seven years before the first settlers came to Newport.

Perhaps these statements do not seem entirely convincing. Nevertheless, there seem to be possible grounds for supposing that there was a tower on the Newport site when the English Colonists first arrived, and that it was built in the medieval period. Hjalmar R. Holand attaches a photograph to his article of the Abbey of St. Bavo in Ghent, Belgium. The tower beside the cloister looks almost exactly like the Newport Tower, although there are windows near the top, and the lay-out, though circular in intent, is octagonal in execution. The body of the tower is not cylindrical. The style is that French adaptation of the Nordic that we are accustomed to call Norman.

For what purpose was the Tower built? In his poem, "The Skeleton in Armor," Longfellow has the dead Viking say,

> ". . . There for my lady's bower
> Built I the lofty tower
> Which to this very hour,
> Stands looking seaward."

It is commonly felt that Longfellow was alluding to the Newport Tower in the lines quoted above. We cannot truly believe that it was used as a private home as he does, nor does the altar mean that the tower was necessarily part of a church or monastery. It would be more in the fashion of the Celts to found monastic institutions on a voyage, or to make a voyage to seek out some lonely promontory for a monastery. The structure would be, most likely, a fort, possibly a stronghold against the Indians. By 999 the Norsemen were Christian, and some remnant of the "Age of Faith" would have touched them. Mass would have been sung by candle light in the stone chamber, as a prelude to a foraging expedition or an exploratory voyage or, for that matter, to herald every dawning day.

If indeed the Danes were responsible for the Tower, which stage of their development would it represent? From the preceding paragraphs, it would seem most likely that the style of architecture is intended to be Norman.

Romanesque is the name given to the style of architecture prevalent in Europe between the time of Constantine the Great, A. D. 325 and the year 1000. The name is also applied to a span of time, the Romanesque period. The Viking voyages certainly fall within that span, occurring as they do between 999 and 1003, encompassing the last five or more years of that period. Norman architecture is Romanesque, further developed. In France there was a richer treatment of detail. In England Norman architecture is sometimes called English Romanesque. The Newport Tower bears characteristics of both styles. The Viking explorations were not too early for Viking knowledge of Romanesque construction. If, as Dr. Mallery says, the units of measure used is a Church unit, the design may have been dictated by Norse churchmen travelling with the expeditions.

Three times the Danes played an important part in the history of a nation which became the world's greatest Naval Empire. In the days of the early Germanic invasions, a poem was carried to Britain from some area on the banks of the Vistula. It told of those who called themselves the Spear-Danes and, beneath a thin veneer of Christian coloring, we read the primitive take of how the Spear-Danes, in days gone by, called upon a Goth warrior to help them destroy a brace of monsters who were killing off the heroes who attended King Hrothgar and Queen Waeltheow at Heorot. The manuscript is dated after A. D. 700, but was written before the Angles, Saxons and Jutes established themselves in England. As in the Sagas, we hear in these early poems of the life of the wanderer and the seafarer, or "wolf," whose days are filled with wind, ice, storm and spray. He urges his rowers down the "whale's way," the ocean, in a "Dragon" ship, and comes to the shore of England, versed in the use of the "blood-drinker," or sword, laden with heavy gold arm rings to be used as currency. The Britons were defeated, driven back to the Welsh marches and the Scottish hills, and a state evolved, a highly organized state with a strictly formulated code of laws, with councils and varying ranks of government officials. In time Alfred became King. Religion, history, local tradition and philosophy were translated by monks, according to his decree into the Anglo-Saxon language. A later surge of Nordic seafarers then came to England, to attack, conquer and settle down in the Northern portion of the Island. They cost Alfred much hardship and many men. This was between the years 800 and 900. Then 166 years later, a band of French-speaking Christians, Vikings some generations before, conquered England, already twice claimed by Scandinavians.

These facts give us some clue to our conclusions concerning the Tower. We can only say that the evidence published in 1951 gives us an adequate basis for belief in a medieval origin. But we cannot be more specific. We still have no proof that the Vikings built the Tower. It is probable, however, that it was built by Europeans at a date later than 1000, if the similarity to the Belgian Abbey is trustworthy. There have been theories about an exploration in 1380 or thereabouts. The explorers of that period were supposed to have been monks who left their island monastery near Scotland and sighted the coast of Cape Breton. But this is just another romance. There is not an iota of proof. Yet it seems likely that the Tower had been built by persons more interested in a permanent foot-hold than the semi-foraging Danes. And if the Danes had built a watchtower to command the shore line, whom did they expect from the land? Was there any threat from the sea of any sort, against which they should post a guard?

PEDIGREE 4A

Viking Lineage of

COLONEL HARRY JUDSON BEARDSLEY

37. EYVIND THE EASTMAN married Raverta of Ireland and had

36. Thurid, who married THORSTEIN THE RED. Thurid's brother, Ulf the Squinter, married Bjorg and had (a) Jorund, grandfather of LIEF ERICKSON, THE LUCKY, and (b) Atli the Red, grandfather of ARI MARSON, who was in the New World before his cousin, Lief the Lucky. He was captured by the Irish colonists here, was baptized by them and, although a captive, became a sort of chief. Thorstein and Thurid were the parents of

35. Groa, who married Duncan, Mormaer of Caithness.

34. Grelod of Caithness, married in 941 Thorfinn I, Jarl of Orkney, nephew of Rollo, Duke of Norway. Thorfinn died in 963.

33. Llodver, Jarl of Orkney, died 980, married Audna and had

32. Sigurd, 2d Earl of Orkney, who died in 1014.

31. Thorfinn II, Earl of Orkney, born 999, died 1064, married Ingebiorg, daughter of Finn Arneson and his wife Thorbiorg (Bergliot) grandniece of Harold III Hardradi. It was probably Thorfinn II who defeated Duncan of Scotland and thus enabled Macbeth to seize the throne, although he had no real claim to it, unless through his wife Gruach, who appears to have been a member of the royal family. The son of Thorfinn II and Ingebiorg was

30. Paul I, Earl of Orkney, died 1103, who married Ragnhild, daughter of Hakon I, King of Sweden, died 1079, and his wife Ragnhild of Norway.

29. Hakon, Earl of Orkney, died 1122, married Helga, daughter of Moddan, Earl of Caithness. Their daughter

28. Ingebiorg of Orkney married Olaf I, King of the Isle of Man, died 1154, son of King Godfred.

27. Ragnhild of Man married 1140 Somerled II, lord of the Isles, died 1164.

26. Reginald, lord of the Isles, died 1207, married Fonia, daughter of Ranulph, Earl of Moray.

25. Ragnhild (Hilda) of the Isles married Alan MacDonal, Lord of Galloway, died 1223, son of Roland, lord of Galloway, died 1200 (and his wife Elena Moreville) a grandson of Elizabeth, who is said to be a daughter of William II, King of England. Their daughter

24. Helen MacDonal married Roger de Quincey (son of the Surety 25 SAIRE de QUINCEY, q. v.) who held his father's estates while his brother Robert was in the Holy Land, succeeded as Earl of Winchester in 1235 and died 25 April 1264.

23. Ela Quincey, died 1296, married Alan la Zouche of Ashby, co. Leicester, died 1269, a descendant of the Earls of Brittany.

22. Roger, Baron Zouche of Ashby, died 1285, married Ela, daughter of Emeline of Ulster and her husband Stephen Longespee.

21. Alan la Zouche, born 1267, died 1314, married Eleanor, daughter perhaps of Nicholas de Segrave.

20. Elena Zouche, born 1288, married second about 1317 Alan de Charlton of Apley, Shropshire, died 3 December 1360, probably brother of John, first Baron Charlton of Powys.

19. Alan de Charlton, born about 1318/9, died 3 May 1349, married Margery FitzAer, born 4 April 1314, died about 1349. She was descended in the male line and in the eighth generation from Alcher, Domesday Lord of Aston Aer, Harcott, Middleton, Great Withyford and Albrighton in Shropshire.

18. Thomas de Charlton of Appleby, Salop, born 1345, died 6 October 1387, married and had.

17. Anna Charlton, born before 1380, died in or before 1399, married William de Knightley. Their son

16. Thomas de Knightley de Charlton, born about 1394, died 1460, inherited Apley Castle from the Charlton family and adopted that name, married Elizabeth, whose surname may have been Francis.

15. Robert Charlton, born before 1430, died 1471, married Mary, daughter of Robert Corbet of Morton, Shropshire.

14. Richard Charlton, born 1450, died 1522, married Anne, daughter of William Mainwaring of Ightfield, Shropshire.

13. Anne Charlton, born about 1480, in 1500 married Randall Grosvenor of Bellaport, Shropshire, born about 1480, died 1559/60. Their daughter

12. Elizabeth Grosvenor, born 1515, married Thomas Bulkeley of Woore, Shropshire, born about 1515, died 1591.

11. Rev. Edward Bulkeley, D.D., born about 1540, buried 5 January 1620, married Olive Irby, born about 1547, buried at Odell 10 March 1614/5.

10. Rev. Peter Bulkeley, M.A., of Concord, Massachusetts, born at Odell, Bedford, 31 January 1582/3, died 9 March 1658/9, married first at Goldington, co. Bedford, 12 April 1613 Jane Allen, baptized at Goldington 13 January 1587/8, buried at Odell, co. Bedford, 8 December 1626. The Allen family from which Jane descended was long seated at Thaxted, co. Essex, and the name was spelled Aleyn in the earlier generations. From this family sprang two Lord Mayors of London and a line of Baronets at Hatfield Peverell, Essex; the first Baronet was Jane's own cousin.

9. Thomas Bulkeley, baptized at Odell 13 April 1617, died at Fairfield, Connecticut, in 1658, married Sarah Jones, born in England about 1620, died at Fairfield in 1682.

8. Joseph Bulkeley, born at Fairfield, died there in 1719, married Martha Beers, who died after 1720.

7. Peter Bulkeley, born at Fairfield 25 December 1683, where he died 18 July 1753, married first Hannah Ward, died about 1722.

6. James Bulkeley of Fairfield, Connecticut, born 1729, died 1803, married Elizabeth Whitehead, born about 1738, died 1809.

5. Abigail Bulkeley, born 1760, died 1833, married at Fairfield 28 January 1779, Josiah Beardsley of Fairfield, born at Stratford, Connecticut, 6 February 1750, died in 1842. Mr. Beardsley was of Greenfield Parish, Fairfield, at the time of his marriage. He served in October 1777 in Capt. Ebenezer Hill's Company for the short campaign at the Fishkills.

4. Eli Beardsley of Bridgewater, Connecticut, born 26 August 1781, died 15 June 1850, married Patty Lewis, born 1779, died 31 January 1851, daughter of Abel Lewis.

3. Lewis Wells Beardsley of Bridgewater, born 1813, died 1877, married Nellie Judson, born 1809, died 1853, daughter of Reuben Judson.

2. Henry Bulkeley Beardsley of Waterbury, Connecticut, born 1841, died 1909, married Henrietta Elizabeth Atwood, born 1849, died 1926, daughter of Garwood Harvey Atwood.

1. COLONEL HARRY JUDSON BEARDSLEY of Waterbury, Connecticut, born 16 May 1878, B.A., L.L.B., Yale University; Judge of the District Court of Waterbury, and Court of Common Pleas, 1924-31; Commissioner of Fort Griswold, 1945-46; Colonel, 1937, formerly of the Judge Advocate General's Dept. Reserve; president of the Connecticut Officers, 1933-34 (Reserve Officers Assn.); president First Corps Area, 1934-35 (New England); president Waterbury Officers 1937-38; president Waterbury Club 1921-22; for 16 years on Board of Education, Waterbury, Connecticut; Governor of Connecticut.

ROBIN HOOD
THE ARCHER

CHAPTER 266

Robin Hood of Sherwood Forest

There are few who have not heard of Maid Marian, of Robin Hood, or of his foresters, the doughty archers who wore the Lincoln green and who lived in the good Greenwood of Sherwood Forest: Alan-a-Dale, Midge, Will Stutely, the foppish Will Scarlet and the burly Little John, who cudgeled Robin Hood on the bridge. To these the Geste adds Gilbert of the White Hand and Reynold.

The question is, how much of this pleasant lore belongs to history and how much to legend. The various characters in the cast may have been added to Robin Hood's company at different times, and it is also possible that when the Robin Hood tradition absorbed them they had come into the story fully accoutered with traditions of their own. Will Stutely is a late addition, we know, and he became so popular in the 16th Century that a pedigree was drawn up for him, though his place in history was more shadowy that that of Robin Hood himself.

Robin Hood has been described as "the hero of a group of old English ballads, represented as an outlaw and a robber, but of a gallant and generous nature, whose familiar haunts are the Forests of Sherwood and Barnsdale, where he fleets the time carelessly in the merry Greenwood. He is ever genial and good natured, religious, respectful to the Virgin and to all women for her sake, with a kind of gracious and noble dignity in his bearing. He lives by the king's deer, though personally most loyal, and wages ceaseless warfare on all proud bishops, abbots and knights, taking of their superfluity and giving liberally to the poor and to all honest men in distress, of whatever degree. He is unrivaled with the bow and quarterstaff; but in as many as eight of the extant ballads comes off the worse in the combat with some stout fellow, whom he thereupon induces to join his company."

A stalwart curtail friar called Friar Tuck in the title, though not in the ballad, fights with Robin Hood, and apparently accepts the invitation to join his company, as he appears later in two broadsides which also mention Maid Marian. Such in the romantic figure of the greatest of English popular heroes, a kind of yeoman counterpart to the knightly Arthur, who is the hero of Tennyson.

Robin Hood is first mentioned in the second edition of the B text of Piers Plowman, a long poem of social protest, which has been dated 1377. Here, a character called Sloth says:

"I know not my Pater Noster perfectly as the priest singeth,

But I know rhymes of Robin Hood, and Randolf, erle of Chestre."

The language of Piers Plowman is a middle English which may be laborious to read. The above is a modified version. The ballad of Robin Hood and the Monk very possibly dates as far back as the reign of King Edward II. Robin Hood and the Potter and Robyn and Gandelyn are of 15th Century date at the latest. A Lytle Geste of Robyn Hode (Geste meaning a"song of deeds" as in chanson de geste) was printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1510, but it could have been written in the 15th Century, and there is little doubt that the separate ballads from which it was composed are of a still earlier date. The Scottish historian Fordun wrote of Robin Hood in 1386; so it would seem that the Robin Hood tales had reached a peak of popularity in the mid-14th Century, and maintained their popularity through the reign of Elizabeth and well on through the reign of King James.

One man sometimes mentioned as the historical Robin Hood is ROBERT FITZ OOTH. He is said to have been an outlaw nobleman who became the lover of Matilda, the daughter of Robert FitzWalter, the Surety. The only possible explanation for a name like Fitz Ooth is that it is a transformation by folk etymology from Fitz Otho. There was a Fitz Otho in history, an early lord of Windsor Castle, Walter Fitz Otho or Fitz Other, appointed in 1078 by William the Conqueror as Warden of the forests of Berkshire. He had a son Robert, a younger son, who could not have used the paternal given name as a last name, nor could he have used it in the combined form, FitzWalter-Fitz Otho. Yet his connection with forests, as son of a "minister of forestry," and a misappropriation of the name FitzWalter, associating him in the popular mind with the woodland swain who saved the daughter of the later FitzWalter of Dunmow Castle from the frustrate savagery of King John, probably brought him into the Robin Hood legend in the 14th Century, or at least brought a shadow of him into it. But everything was distorted when his memory was added to the Robin Hood tradition, even his father's name Otho (Otto).

Robert was the Baron of Eston or Estaines of co. Essex in the historical account, and his son William had a daughter who married Robert de Hastings. They had a daughter, Delicia, who married Henry de Cornhill, and their daughter Jane married Godfrey de Lovaine. Matthew de Lovaine, son of Godfrey, had a daughter who married into the Bourchier family, and they kept the Eston holdings until the time of King Henry VIII.

Robin Hood's identity will always remain clouded. He doubtless was an historical character, probably a local outlaw and small poacher whose story had become romanticized, thereby creating an appeal to those of the surrounding communities. As the tradition grew it absorbed the French pastoral songs and stories of the country boy and girl, Robin and Marian, who are to be found immortalized in Adam de la Hale's opera of the early 13th Century. The French country heroine becomes merged with the Maid Marian of the May dances and subsequent association with rural games, tattered remnants of earlier fertility cults.

The tale of Robin Hood gathered up fragments of popular romances, such as The Foure Sonnes of Aymon, a romance so popular that William Caxton felt called upon to print it and make it available to a wider audience. It ranks with England's first printed books and England's best sellers. The romance of Gamelon, the forerunner of Shakespeare's As You Like It, was also woven into the Robin Hood web. Again it is a tale of rebels forced to flee the law and live in the forest. In the Shakespeare play the foresters are noblemen gone wrong. The tradition may also have absorbed the peasant trend preserved in the Flemish beast tale of the rogue hero, Reynard the Fox, who is ever at variance with the robber Baron, Isengrim the Wolf, and with the Church; for his disguise as a friar, like Robin Hood's, is considered a fitting rebuke to the corrupt clergy.

As the Robin Hood tradition progresses it degenerates, as did the Arthurian tales and ballads. No longer is the notion of simple piety and chivalry palatable. It has been reiterated much too often. The stories of Sir Gawain have become the stories of a prig, and the hero is set up for ridicule. Likewise Robin Hood becomes a figure of fun, and the later ballads are doggerel, dealing with buffoonery and vulgar practical joking, allying the tradition at least in spirit with the tales of Reynard.

Some have said that Robin Hood was a Saxon of the 12th Century, still holding out against the Norman occupation, or a symbol of that stubborn, taciturn resistance; and some have said that he and Little John were two heroes who were with Simon de Montfort at the Battle of Evesham, though we have no guide as to what led anyone to this supposition.

Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, was fighting against the forces of young Prince Edward. The Prince managed to defeat Leicester in the Valleys of the Severn and the Usk. They approached Evesham on 4 August 1265, in time to cut Leicester off from Kenilworth Castle, where the forces of the younger Montfort had already been cut to pieces. The Earl found himself caught in the bend of the River Avon, blocked by the ranks of the Royalist forces. With near superhuman savagry he cut his way out, and chopped his path Northward. But now as success seemed almost a certainty, his Welsh levies drifted away and defeat was soon inevitable. On Green Hill, to the Northwest of the town of Evesham, his devoted followers formed a ring around their lord and died with him in combat. Were Robin Hood and Little John there? It seems doubtful.

Robin Hood has also been associated with a rebel Earl of Lancaster in the reign of Edward II. The most rebellious Earl of that reign was Thomas, the son of Edmund, surnamed Crouchback who, tired of the feckless and psychotic Monarch and his worthless, pleasure-loving favorites, the younger Hugh Despencer and Piers Gaveston, rebelled and was beheaded for treason at Pontefract. Crouchback was created Earl of Lancaster in 1267 and his son Thomas would have been too late for the Robin Hood role, for the legend was complete by the mid-14th Century. For the same reason, it would seem unlikely that the forester was one of de Montfort's men.

There are indications that Robin Hood has been identified with Robert Locksley, a murderer of Bradford in Hallamshire, and that he was Robert FitzOoth, Earl of Huntington. The latter tradition seems to have derived from a play of 1598 called the Downfall. In it Matilda, daughter of Robert FitzWalter, Baron of Bayard and Dunmow, and the Leader of the Magna Charta Barons, was importuned by King John. She thwarted her royal lover by eloping with Robert FitzOoth and fleeing with him to Sherwood Forest. There, according to one version, the two bided virtuously apart until a marriage could be conveniently arranged. Another version has it that Friar Tuck was ready to receive them in an appointed glade, where he married them.

It is certainly true that there were tales of King John's attempt to seduce Baron FitzWalter's daughter, or any Baron's lady within reach of the Court. In the Historie des Ducs de Normandie (p. 118) it is mentioned specifically as a tale told to King Philip. The Chronicle of Dunmow Abbey printed in the Monasticum (Dugdale, Monasticum VI, 147) says that the King when frustrated attempted to poison Matilda. This story, and that other of John's attempted rape on the person of the wife of the Surety Eustace de Vesci, seem to be backstair gossip, refurbished in order to show why these two lords rebelled against their King, and also to serve generally as propaganda, though it would seem that the truth alone could condemn King John sufficiently. Still, the elopement of Matilda and Earl FitzOoth has no substance.

A freer version of the above has it that Robin Hood was Robert FitzOoth, Earl of Huntington in Locksley, Nottinghamshire. Once again we hear the name Locksley. The other time it was the outlaw's surname. Such are the ways of oral tradition. He is said to have contracted a fever and to have gone to his kinswoman, the prioress of the nunnery of Kirkless, for aid. She thereupon cut the appropriate vein for the medication of bleeding and did nothing further. Robin subsequently bled to death. The date of the episode is definitely set as 18 November 1247.

The phrase concerning Robin Hood in Piers Plowman does not assert that he was Randolf, Earl of Chester. Sloth merely says that he knows rhymes of Robin Hood and of the Earl of Chester. This linkage, however, has caused some to believe that Robin Hood and the Earl of Chester were one.

Ralph, Ranulph, Randle, or Randolph de Blundvill (ca. 1172-1232) succeeded Hugh de Keveliok as Earl of Chester in 1181. He was created Earl of Lincoln in 1217. He married Constance, the widow of Geoffrey of Brittany, son of King Henry II. He fought for King John in Wales against the Barons in the dispute over Magna Charta, and was an Executor for the King. He was in the army of King Henry III, fighting against the French invaders and their allies. In 1218 he went on a Crusade and took part in the siege of Damietta. He returned home to England and died in October 1232 at Wallingford. Stubbs says of him, "On more than one occasion he refused his consent to taxation, which he declared unjust; his jealousy of Hubert de Burgh, although it led him to join the foreign party in 1223, did not prevent him from more than once interposing to prevent his overthrow." Randolph's unique position in the kingdom "fitted him for the part of leader of the opposition to royal or ministerial tyranny." Was this Robin Hood? The date is better suited for the start of the legend. But this was a man of arms and armies, a fully caparisoned lord who supported his king, fought openly in the field of battle, and wore the Crusader's Cross. We cannot possibly imagine him defying in any way the organized power of the Church, let alone skulking about in the woods or having any part in guerilla warfare.

If Robin Hood were not the lover of Matilda, the widow of Theobald Walter, perhaps he had some connection with Fulke FitzWarin. Fulke's story is told in a romance. The connection again is probably an accretion of details, taken from Fulke's story, associated with other popular romances of outlaw heroes.

The romance Fouke FitzWarin is the tale of an historical person. He was a simple knight of minimal landed power. He defied King John, urging his friends to revolt, and went into hiding for three years with a band of outlaws. They did not, however, stay in any one place, nor did they live solely in the forest as archers. Their exploits were on both sea and land.

Fulke FitzWarin was later pardoned at the request of two of the King's most intimate friends, and he was given those things which he had originally sought. Finally he was granted the hand of a rich widow in marriage. Perhaps the story is true, odd as it sounds. John might have felt that a man who could defy his government successfully for three years was too good a man to lose. Soldiers were a valuable asset to a feudal monarch and, doubtless, fighting men of Fulke's calibre were not often found. Fulke seems to have been active in Shropshire in 1200 and 1201. On 30 April 1202 we have a record of the King's pardon of one Eustace de Kivelly who had incurred outlawry by being a companion of Fulke.

Again we ask, was Fulke FitzWarin Robin Hood? The story does not suggest it any more than does Randolph's. The dates of both are the earliest we have for possible historical heroes who might have given rise to the Robin Hood legend. No one has yet proposed a candidate dating to a time before 1200.

ROBIN HOOD
THE DEFENDER

Robin Hood could have been a recognized historical hero but, if he were, the historical personage has become so obscured by the various accretions that he is now entirely unrecognizable. Since the legend was popular in the mid-14th Century, it would have taken some time to build up, and it would seem likely that its roots are to be found at the latest in the first years of the 12th Century. However, there is no reason that the original man should not have dated back to a much earlier time. We have found that it is fairly easy for an historical person to become the focal point of a legend or even a myth. In our own background we have tales of thunder caused by Hendrik Hudson and his crew bowling in the Catskills, and of its origin in the cannon of the "Bonhomme Richard" as she sails the stormy seas. Surely Robin Hood is more likely to be a human being than these demigods. Whoever he was, he has become hopelessly confused with other persons of historical and legendary note.

A ballad about a local lad who ran with a rural gang would, on the other hand, have been quite sufficient to make the beginnings of a Robin Hood romance: A story of a young leader who lived on the King's deer and gave the spoils of his larceny to beggars. Couple that with peasant resentment of the ferocious taxes of King John's reign, the tradition of cruelty connected with the feudal nobility, and middle class distrust of high ranking Church officials, and the rest comes naturally. The legend appealed to the lower classes, as the Arthurian romances appealed to the aristocracy. There was no yeoman who was deaf to the call, "Come hither, come hither, come hither. No enemy shall he see, but winter and rough weather." And every knave who was wont to "tune his merry note unto the sweet bird's throat" knew the boyish delight of poaching and tried his prowess with the long yew bow. It does not, in the final analysis, seem necessary to suppose that the historical Robin Hood was an historical celebrity. He probably was some one, we know not who, but perhaps a local rustic of Nottinghamshire or a neighboring shire. The date is probably the reign of King Richard I or King John. The sheriff of Nottingham, in some versions, is one of John's many tax collecting officials and the official devil and whipping boy. During John's reign the cost of court maintenance was high, and thus the prevalence of such persons as the famed sheriff, and stories of a series of attempts to outwit him would not be unlikely at that period.

Before we end our discussion of Robin Hood, let us give a thought to those of his company who have been discussed by scholars. Little John, the stout churl with the quarterstaff, was John Little or John Nailor. And it was a good joke to reverse his name, since he was a giant of a man. Friar Tuck, a fat but muscular Churchman, was apparently tolerated by Robin Hood. He was fond of showing that he was as brawny as any man in the Greenwood company. He was Chaplain to the little band and got his name from the fact that his habit was tucked or bloused over his cincture, to facilitate swift movement through the forest.

Maid Marian has been identified as Matilda, that sweetheart of the outlaw Earl, FitzOoth. She is, however, a later addition and is mentioned only after Robin Hood has become associated with the Mayday games and morris dances in which her role was played by a boy. She is represented with a wig of long hair surmounted by a golden crown and she carries a red carnation in her left hand. Friar Tuck is paired with her in the May game tradition. The association of Robin and Marian from the French tradition couples her with Robin Hood, whose costume of Lincoln green ties him in as a wood sprite and fertility deity, and he becomes her woodland lover and King of the May.

Rob Roy of the Highlands

The history of Rob Roy is bound up with the fortunes of Clan Gregor. Clan Gregor was a warlike faction that thought nothing of sweeping down from its Highland retreat and raiding nearby landholdings. About the year 1586 the Earl of Montrose felt the threat of the MacGregors of Glenstrae. In that year the Earl exacted a friendly "submission" from them, but he also had to invoke the law when they murdered Drummond, the King's forester of Glenartney. Poaching, robbery, strife and murder were a way of life for Clan Gregor. In 1598 John Grant of Freuchie made use of a Charter granted him by the Earl of Moray over the lands and lordship of Abernethy, to take proceedings against the Gregor faction. His patience was exhausted and he finally executed two of them for theft in his Castle of Ballachastell and, in 1613, took prisoner Allister MacAllister, one of their ringleaders. Allister died while in Grant's custody, but apparently Grant's actions against Clan Gregor were caused largely by Government pressure for, when that pressure was removed, it was found that he had actually given shelter to some of them. Thus it seems that as early as the last two decades of the 16th Century, the MacGregors were virtually outlaws, hunted out at the behest of the Government.

Archibald Campbell, seventh Earl of Argyll (1575-1638) nicknamed "Gruamach" or "the Grim," was given a commission of justiciary against Clan Gregor on 1 February 1692/3. In 1592 he had narrowly escaped poisoning at the hands of one Campbell of Lochnell, a man closely connected with Clan Gregor, and next in line to the Earldom of Argyll. On 14 December 1598 he got another commission against the Clan, but his execution of it does credit neither to Argyll nor to the Government. The MacGregors had made a raid on Lennox and had killed eighty or more of the Colquhouns who had put up a severe resistance in Glen Fruin. Argyll was blamed for the bloodshed and was suspected of having let the massacre proceed as a means of ridding himself of his personal enemies, some of whom were Colquhouns. Pressure was brought to bear and Archibald the Grim plied the chieftain, Alexander MacGregor, with promises which, according to MacGregor's dying statement, were kept "only in the shadow, but broken in the substance." The outcome was the hanging of a MacGregor Chief and seven of the Clan at Edinburgh, 20 January 1604.

Glen Fruin is one of the more famous glens in the Highland portion of Dumbartonshire. As was indicated above, the Colquhouns were nearly exterminated in this Glen in 1603, and Clan Gregor was proscribed. That meant that they were henceforth to run wild through the raths and valleys, getting food where and how they could, and that the death of any one of them was sanctioned by the Government. It would seem that such measures would make worse criminals of them while they lived. This, then, is the family background of Robert MacGregor, better known as Rob Roy, or Robert the Red.

In 1662 the Scottish Parliament had completely outlawed the Clan, and it is at this later date that we meet Rob Roy, often under the name of Campbell, for he had assumed his mother's name as protection after the proscription had beeen officially announced. An early novel by Sir Walter Scott bears this hero's name as its title and, after indicating who and what he was, we might quote Scott's description of him.

In 1671 Rob Roy was born into the troublesome Clan Gregor. His outlaw life, however, had been ascribed to personal financial losses in 1712, which turned him to a life of robbery rather than to the Government proscription on his Clan, dating back some sixty years or more before his birth. His legend is localized in the vicinity of Loch Katrine and Loch Lomond, consisting of romantic escapes from prison, evasions of pursuers, plunder of the rich and generosity to the poor. He became the stock romantic bandit, a Highland Robin Hood. In some of these stories, folk who had benefited from his generosity warn him of his persecutors, the Duke of Athole and of course the Duke of Montrose, continuing the old border feud in the role of a Scottish sheriff of Nottingham. They tell of soldiery summoned by the aforesaid lairds from Dumbarton and Stirling, reminding us of the Western badmen, the posses of the law, ranch kings and wicked sheriffs of current romancing.

The name of Argyll is still prominent in the story, but this time as an aid and protector, for Rob Roy had taken the name of Campbell, and the Campbells had long been the Earls of Argyll. In his later years Rob Roy is said to have turned to the Roman Catholic Church, but in the list of subscribers to the Episcopalean Church History of Bishop Keith we find the name of "Robert MacGregor alias Rob Roy." Since the Church of England was the most likely non-Roman Church with an Episcopal organization, barring Methodism, it might seem that Rob Roy was possibly being politically unwise in his choice of a religious faith, for it was in his Century that Prince Charlie had plans for relieving King George III of his Crown. But Rob was both a natural rebel and a declared criminal, and treason or treacherous acts might be normal for him.

Rob Roy died in his own home at Balquhidder 28 December 1734, apparently of natural causes. He had five sons, two of whom died in the same year as their father. James and Robin paid with their lives for their crimes—James as an outlaw in Paris and Robin on the gallows at Edinburgh for abduction.

Sir Walter Scott describes Rob Roy as "rather beneath the middle size than above it; his limbs were formed upon the very strongest model that is consistent with agility. Two points in his person interfered with the rules of symmetry: His shoulders were so broad . . . as to give him the air of being too square in respect to his stature; and his arms, though round, sinewy and strong, were so very long as to be rather a deformity." (Rob Roy MacGregor xxiiii)

It is interesting to note that another MacGregor has perpetuated the name of Rob Roy. This was the son of General Sir Duncan MacGregor, K. C. B., canoeist, traveler and philanthropist. John MacGregor (1825-1892) had a roving disposition, a love for mechanics as well as for literature. He traveled through Europe, Egypt, Palestine, Russia, Algeria and America, while pursuing his researches in the history and methods of marine propulsion. He is considered the pioneer of British canoeing. In 1865 he made famous his canoe, Rob Roy with his tour of the waterways of Europe. His book, A Thousand Miles in the Rob Roy Canoe made his journeys and his craft one more factor in the MacGregor romance. Many longer trips were to follow and to be written up. Thus a MacGregor again made the name of Rob Roy famous for romantic vagabondage and adventure.

His uncle, James MacGregor, alias Thomas MacGehee after his Clan was outlawed, served in the English Army, moved to Virginia and resided in St. John's parish, King William County. His Will is dated 27 July 1727.

Madoc of Gwynedd

Another hero half historical and half legendary is Madoc, the pre-Columbian visitor to our Southern shores. According to Welsh tradition he was the son of Owen Gwynedd (Gwyneth), King of North Wales, who died in 1169. Madoc is said to have set sail in 1170 and to have established a colony on the Southern branches of the Missouri. He returned to Wales and brought more companions with him to North America. There is some question as to how many voyages he made and whether or not he was on the final one, which never returned to Wales. Concurrent with Madoc's voyages was the desertion of Aztlan by the Aztecs, who chose as their leader Yuhidthiton and with him founded the Empire of Mexico and named their nation for Mexitli, their tutelary god. Robert Southey's epic, Madoc, written about 1810, combines these two traditions.

There has been much discussion of Madoc and Mexico. According to Southey, Madoc lived there many years. Some legends tell how he became a culture-hero god, the white god who came from nowhere and spread new knowledge among the people, only to return to the place of his mysterious origin, with a promise to return. He has often been identified with Quetzlcoatl. One reason for this supposition is that Quetzlcoatl means "winged serpent." The frequent carvings of winged serpents found in the ruins of Aztec buildings are his symbols. Some people have supposed that this winged serpent was suggested by the griffin or dragon on Madoc's signet ring for, as a member of the Welsh royal family, he would surely bear the red griffin of Wales; and a winged serpent, authority and godhead would have been considered identical by the Aztecs. Apparently Quetzlcoatl was of a light complexion, or white. Seemingly he was bearded. A beard of any consequence is not to be found on an Indian face. He does not seem to have been of the same racial stock as his followers, but is that any proof that of all white men he was Madoc?

Let us now go back to Wales and see how that Country was faring for some two hundred years before Madoc's birth. Before the reign of Stephen it had been well under English control, but the Welsh saw hope for independence during the chaos of King Stephen's regime, and sought to take advantage of the preoccupation of the English with their own confused affairs. Owen, son of Griffith ap Cynan, heir to the throne of Gwynedd, and Griffith ap Rhys, ruler of Dynavor, were strong men and gave courage to the Cymry. In 1136 Griffith ap Rhys met a large English contingent near Cardigan, a contingent composed of the combined forces from the castles of South Wales and bands of the hated Flemish colonists which King Henry II had planted in Dyfed. A fierce battle ensued in which the Norman-Flemish forces were driven back. The following year, 1137, the two above mentioned princes died –Griffith ap Cynan, "the sovereign and protector and peacemaker of all Wales," and Griffith ap Rhys, "the light and strength and gentleness of the men of the South."

In 1157 King Henry II made an expedition into North Wales and forced Owen, son of Griffith ap Cynan, to become his vassal. This achievement was brought about by arms, and the English onslaughts were met by an army of offense, which more than once caused the English army to retreat. Finally, an insecure peace was made. In 1169 Owen Gwynedd died. He was buried at Bangor Cathedral, after a reign of thirty-three years in which he was partly successful in bringing about a union of all Wales, a union which his grandson was to complete.

According to the Caradoc History of Cambria [See H. Lloyd, The Historie of Cambriae now called Wales . . . New Created, Augmented and Continued out of Records and Best approved Authors (David Powell, 1584)] Owen's rightful successor was Iowerth Drwynden, known as Edward of the Broken Nose. Being so self-conscious about this mutilation that he considered himself unfit to take upon himself the government of his Country, his younger brothers had visions of attaining the throne. Howell, a half-brother, however, soon took advantage of the bickering among his brothers, and planted himself on the throne, whereupon the other half-brother, David, devoted his energies to getting him off. This was no easy task, for what Howell had taken, Howell was going to keep. In the end, David and Howell settled the matter in a duel. Howell was killed, and David was unanimously proclaimed Prince of North Wales, enjoying that title until his nephew, Llewelyn ap Iowerth, (not Llewelyn the Great, also a Llewelyn ap Iowerth) came of age.

Is it surprising then that the youngest of Owen's sons should take to the sea? Furthermore, David married Emma, King Henry II's half sister. This action discomfited the Welsh people, who felt that such an alliance could only lead to a betrayal into the hands of their ancient enemy. Their fears were justified when David, soon after his marriage, sent a thousand men to serve under King Henry in Normandy. Later David went to Oxford and entered Parliament, swearing allegiance to the King of England. This rebirth of international ill will seemed to be another annoyance to the introverted Madoc, causing him to seek peace on the high seas.

Before we go further, let us look at a plan of Madoc's family and lineage.

Maelgan Gwynedd, King of Wales, fl. 350.

Llewellyn ap Seissgylt, died 1022, married Angharad.

Griffith ap Cynan, King of Gwynedd, died 1137. His son Owen ap Griffith, died 1169, married first Brenda, daughter of Howell, Lord of Caro, and had: Cynan, who had Rhun, who had Iowerth, who married and had Llewlyn, who later threatened David's title to the throne. He had Maelgan, who had Rhodi, who had Rhiryd (Eiryd), Lord of Colochran, Ireland, and was the father of Madoc.

Owen ap Griffith married second Christiant and had David, who married Emma, half sister of King Henry II.

Madoc, son of Owen and Brenda, above, married Annesta, Christiant's maid of honor, and had Gwenllian, who married Llowerch ap Bran, descended from Rhodri Mawr (Roderick the Great) the greatest of the Welsh kings and, according to legend, of Arthur's blood.

Owen ap Griffith married third Pyog, a lady of Ireland, and had Howell.

The tradition is that Madoc established a colony in North America and that his companions intermarried among the Indians. A letter written in 1782 by John Sevier, Governor of Tennessee, quotes statements made by the Cherokee chieftain, Oconostota, who said that there were in Tennessee white men who were Welsh, and who had come over a Great Water. They had landed, he said, at the Bay of Mobile. "I asked him," wrote Sevier, "if he had heard his ancestors say what nation of people these whites belonged to. He answered he had heard his father and grandfathers say they were called Welsh; that they had crossed the Great Water and first landed near Mobile and had been driven up the heads of the waters until they had arrived at the Highwassae River," which is not far from Chattanooga.

According to the accounts in Caradoc and Hackluyt, Madoc returned to Wales, overbrimming with joy over his new discovery and eager to tell his countrymen all about the new land. He had left one hundred twenty Welshmen on American soil, and was going back to invite others in Wales to share in his pleasure in the new land. The second expedition set sail, but when they landed not a trace could be found of the Welsh colony. Madoc searched in the South and West, and in so doing followed the shores of the Gulf of Mexico until he reached the mouth of the Mississippi at least, according to George Catlin.

Apparently on his search he did not encounter the original pioneers who had been driven away from the coast by the Indians and had traveled North. Madoc, meanwhile, was heading toward Mexico where the adulation he received put his displaced countrymen completely out of mind. Some of them, it is said, set out to sea and, finding the Gulf Stream, sailed back to Wales.

A third expedition was organized and set forth. Since Madoc was not with them, we can only suppose that he had stayed in Mexico. The third group, so the legend goes, fared Southward and reached Florida. Others believe that it reached Guadaloupe, for Antonio de Herrara, the Spanish historian, says that Columbus found the remains of a European style of ship there, which he was unable to account for. We cannot, however, know much of this expedition, for the voyagers, once having embarked, were never seen again.

Some early travelers have testified that they had encountered Indians who could understand Welsh, though little is mentioned about their speaking it. These Indians were white, and they were bearded. They also owned skin covered books or parchments which they held in high esteem but which they could not read; but then practically no European out of Holy Orders could read. These books have been alluded to as "Bibles." There was, however, no Welsh translation of the Bible and printing was not accomplished until 1172. The Bibles were probably small psalters, handwritten in Latin, which had been brought by priests, and which had come into the hands of the Indians when the priests had died. No expedition of the 12th Century would have ventured forth without a priest, and no priest would have gone anywhere without a psalter.

The remarks made about the Indians who understood Welsh are interesting. Understanding a language differs from speaking it. Emotion can sometimes be communicated even when the gestures and facial expressions of another culture convey no meaning. It is said that the Indians knew what was going on at dramatic moments, that they knew that a Welshman, condemned to death, was praying. Are not the intense emotions those most easily conveyed, and is it unusual for any human being to suspect that someone is reacting to a particular situation in a manner similar to that of almost anyone in his experience who had ever been faced with that situation?

The tradition of the Welsh or White Indians and the "Ten Lost Tribes of Israel" among the American Indians is of great interest. James Mooney in his Article in the American Anthropologist [IV (1891) 393-394] writes of the mixed descendants of Madoc's colony, and traces the developments and elaborations of the tradition to an Article in the Turkish Spy, published in London about 1730.

At first the Welsh Indians are described as speaking Welsh and references are made to Welsh Bibles, rosaries, crucifixes and the like, found in their possession. We find them near the Atlantic coast where they are first identified with the Tuscaroras of the Iroquois Tribe. By 1776 they had retreated inland, to be found on the banks of the Missouri, North of St. Louis. A few years later they moved again, dwelling far up the Red River. They then went Westward and became identified with the Mandans, whose language seemed to Catlin to have a Welsh element. Then they became the Moqui, a Pueblo Tribe of Northeastern Arizona, and next the Modocs, whose name suggests Madoc. Their final appearance was in Southwestern Oregon before their disappearance in the broad wastes of the Pacific Ocean. See also H. W. Henshaw, "Popular Fallacies Respecting the Indians," American Anthropologist [VII (1905) 104-113].

The Welsh Indian seems more and more improbable as one considers him, and Madoc's motive in leaving Wales is vague. Was he a coward, and if so, how did he manage to face the hardships of the voyage and the hard life in the wilderness? Perhaps he felt that the warfare at home was not worth his efforts, an emotion unworthy of a royal son. Possibly his courage was suited to one sort of danger and not to another. However it may have been, Richard Hackluyt's Principal Navigations, printed in 1589, and his Discourse on Western Planting, printed in 1600, helped Great Britain to assert her claim to America, largely on the strength of the Welsh discovery and settlement of that Country.

"It is much more improbable that there should be no foundation for the reports that have been made since Madoc's voyages," claims George Burder, "and the instance of the Welsh Indians in North America, than that an expedition should have been undertaken in the 11th Century, similar to those which were frequently performed in the 15th. The mariner's compass was probably known at the former period, for it is described by a French poet who wrote early in the 13th Century, but the application of astronomy, which had been customary from remote antiquity, might have sufficed for a voyage to America with persons who had courage enough for the enterprise. Britain was at the time celebrated for its Marine and indeed had been for six hundred years."

Burder's book, The Welsh Discovered America, was printed in London in 1797. At that time the idea of the Noble Savage was still a prevalent sentimental myth, and it is all too likely that since most of Madoc's followers never returned, they were thought to have met sympathetic and noble souls among the savages, or that they had attained a blissful life in "Virginia" with feathered persons of great courtesy. Exactly what part the Noble Savage element has played in building up this tradition we cannot say, but the fact that the greatest amount of discussion of the Indians and the Welsh was written in the late 18th Century, coupled with the belief of many people that the Indian's life was a desirable one (thanks of Rousseau) suggests some sort of interrelationship, perhaps a wishful thought, that the Welsh and the Indians really ought to have lived together.

Contemporary anthropologists feel that the Madoc story is as purely legendary as the tales of Prester John. We cannot prove that any European was in the Alabama-Georgia-Tennessee area before 1540, the earliest date set for Spanish landings. Strange as it may seem, the Spaniards were persistently active even when the English had gained a foothold. The Spaniards were primarily interested in mining and maintained a good deal of secrecy about their mining operations. Consequently, they were working in the wilderness undetected by the English. Tales of white settlers who landed prior to the English were kept fresh in Indian lore by oral transmission. It is therefore quite possible that the reports relayed in the 18th Century of an earlier European landing were reports of Spanish foraging parties only two centuries earlier. Much can happen in two hundred years, much forgetting and embroidery. The tales of the Welsh in the Southeast are filled with the mention of mines. May they have been the hidden mines dug by the Spaniards?

Kent, to Massachusetts in 1634, where he was made Freeman the following year, and Representative to the General Court from 1635 to 1638, in which year they removed to Portsmouth, Rhode Island, where he was governor in 1639 and 1640.

Mrs. Anne Hutchinson courageously lived up to her convictions. Being a Quakeress, she and her husband and fifteen children were banished from Massachusetts in 1638 and went to the Narragansett country where they purchased Aquidneck Island from the Indians and founded the town of Portsmouth, Rhode Island. After her husband's death she went "into the Dutch country west of New Haven" with John Throckmorton who, on 6 July 1643, obtained from Governor Kieft in New York for himself and thirty-five associates a grant of land in Westchester County, a point jutting far out into Long Island Sound. It is now called Throg's Neck (an abbreviation of the old spelling Throgmorton). We learn the settlement here was of short duration, as Mr. Winthrop records, in September 1643, that the Indians set upon the English who dwelt under the Dutch and killed "such of Mr. Throckmorton's and Mr. Cornhill's families as were at home." Anne Hutchinson and most of her young children were also among those cruelly murdered. However, issue survived through two sons and two daughters who escaped, the youngest of whom was *12. Thomas Fiennes, 9th Lord Dacre, born 1515, one of the jury at the trial of Anne Boleyn, 1536, who also bore the canopy at the funeral of Jane Seymour in 1538.

On the eve of May Day 1541, when less than twenty-six years of age, Thomas Fiennes, Lord Dacre, was unfortunately "tempted by his own folly or that of his friends to join a party to kill deer" in the park of an unpopular neighbor. They were seen by the foresters and a fray ensued in which one of the keepers was killed. The charge was indeed serious: manslaughter following deer stealing, which in itself was a felony. Both he and his friends were general favorites, and the privy council hesitated long before they adjudged him guilty, being convinced that "if a poor man must be sent to the gallows for an act into which he might have been tempted by poverty, thoughtlessness could not be held as an excuse because the offender was a peer." King Henry, remaining true to his principles of equal justice, did not intervene, and Thomas was hanged at Tyburn 29 June 1541, whereby it was considered that his honors were forfeited. He was buried in St. Sepulchre's Church near Newgate.

He had two sons: Thomas, who died at the age of fourteen years, and Gregory, Lord Dacre, who died without issue in 1593, and a daughter Margaret Fiennes, of whom later. These children happily were restored in blood, estate and honors by Queen Elizabeth. Thomas, 9th Lord Dacre, married (12) Mary Nevill, who was descended as follows:

Sir Thomas Arundel "Howard," elder son, 1st Baron Arundel of Wardour, passed his early life on the Continent and served in the Imperial Hungarian Army against the Turks during the latter part of the 16th Century. He distinguished himself in battle, and as a reward for his bravery Rudolph II, Emperor of Germany, created him a Count of the Holy Roman Empire. The patent of creation, dated Prague 14 December 1593, conferred the title upon "you, Thomas, and all and every one of your children, heirs and legitimate descendants of both sexes already born or that ever hereafter shall be born." Thus the warrant conferred the title not only on the eldest son but also on every son and daughter and their descendants.

Sir Thomas Arundel Howard died 7 November 1639, having married second, 1 July 1608, Ann Philipson, died 28 June 1637, daughter of Miles Philipson and his wife Barbara Sandys. Being at odds with his noble kinsmen, he continued to use the surname Howard as his father had done. Harry W. Newman, in his Ancestry of Matthew Howard, relates how their eldest son

10. Matthew Arundel-Howard, the emigrant, born in the year 1609 in "Wardour Castle," the ancient castle of the Arundels, died before 1659. He came to Virginia about 1630 and settled in Lower Norfolk County. In 1649 he removed to Anne Arundel County, Maryland, where he was a large landowner. He married in 1689 Rebecca, widow of Thomas Lightfoot and daughter of John Larkin of Anne Arundel County, a large landowner on the Severn. They had

7. Susannah Hammond, who married John Orrick of Morley Choice, Anne Arundel County, Maryland, born 1685 died 1749, son of James Orrick.

In Nesbit's Heraldry, Volume II, is the following comment:

Simon de Orrock is without question the ancestor of the House of Orrock of that ilk in the county of Fife, reputed an ancient family and an honorable one. Sir Simon de Orrock's name is inscribed upon the Ragman's Roll, which for antiquity is the rival of the British Domesday Book.

The name of Orrick or Orrock is said to have originated from the rock upon that part of the Fife coast where lay the large estate of Orrock. A history of the Orrocks of Scotland, whose arms continue to be borne by the Orricks of America, takes us back to the 13th Century.

James Orrick or Orrouch, as his name is quaintly spelled by the scrivener who wrote his Will, appears in the Colony of Maryland about 1650. He was the father of John Orrick, who married No. 7 Susanna Hammond.

6. Capt. Nicholas Orrick of Baltimore, Maryland, born 1 May 1725, died 1 February 1781. He served with distinction as Captain of the Baltimore Company Troops in the War for Independence. He was a zealous and liberal Churchman and for many years was a Vestryman of Old St. Thomas Garrison Forrest. Nicholas married first Hannah Cromwell, born 1 April 1729, died 2 December 1762, daughter of Capt. John Cromwell and his wife Hannah Rattenburg. He married second, 16 March 1769, Mary Bell.

5. John Orrick, born at Baltimore 30 October 1753, died 4 November 1810, married Sarah Merryman, born 15 September 1754, died 5 June 1835.

4. Daniel Orrick, born in Maryland 9 December 1809, died 1 April 1851, married Eleanor Bosley, who was living in 1842.

*3. Chastina Almira Lougee, born 3 November 1853, died at Lafferty Hollow, Foster Township, McKean County, Pennsylvania, 28 November 1911. She married George Saverline, who was born in Germany 2 August 1846 and, in 1850, came to America with his parents, Zabastian Zebelein (German spelling) and Katherine (Katrina) Zummermann. The Zebeleins were warriors of note, bearing on their shield St. Andrew's Cross in gold on a red background; red signifying bloodshed in warfare; the cross, courage and victories in battle. The Zummermann family is one of the most ancient in Germany, distinguished and of noble birth, their coat-of-arms bearing a red rose on a silver background, indicative of great wealth and gentility.

Of this union three children survived as follows:

A. James Wilson Saverline;

B. Francis John Saverline;

C. Alice May Saverline, *2 below.

A. James Wilson Saverline married Mary Vermette and had

Nicholas Camp was one of the founders of Milford, Connecticut, in 1639. Other ancestors were Henry Bottsford, Timothy Baldwin, and Nathaniel (H)Eaton, who came to Boston in 1634 and was made a Freeman in 1639.

The CORNELIUS family has been eminent through the ages for Christian faith and services. The name dates back to B. C. 212 and is one of the oldest in genealogical records. In "Josephus" we find one "Publius Cornelius," second in command of the Roman Army. He was sent to Spain to fight against Hasdrubel, brother of Hannibal, and was killed in battle B. C. 212. Later one of his descendants was "Cornelius, Bishop of Rome" and was called the 21st Pope. He was exiled and martyred A. D. 253. The coat-of-arms bears ermine fur, signifying royalty, and chevrons, suggestive of Divine Protection.

Alice May Cornelius is now Mrs. P. R. Gaskill and is a life member of The National Society Magna Charta Dames (Chaplain of West Texas Colony); Order of Eastern Star, #447, Odessa; White Shrine of Oklahoma, highest Order of religious work in O.E.S. She has one daughter, of whom we treat:

*1. DORIS VIOLET CORNELIUS, born at Bradford, Pennsylvania, 6 December 1907, educated privately and in the public schools there, and later in Ardmore, Oklahoma. On 28 February 1929 she married Estill Carl Reece who holds an executive position with Shell Pipe Line Corporation, having offices in Odessa and Midland, Texas. He will retire soon, with thirty-five years of service. He is a 32° Mason; Shriner of El Maida Temple, El Paso, Texas; Member of the Odessa Chamber of Commerce; and past "Wagon Boss" of the well-known "Odessa Chuck Wagon Gang," who travel in their own planes and buses all over the Nation, serving Western barbeque to as many as 18,000 persons at one time. The couple have one foster daughter, Juanita Williams Wofford of Allen, Oklahoma, who is the mother of:

a. Winfred Earl Wofford;

b. Billye Doris Wofford;

c. Harold Ray Wofford;

d. Garry Dean Wofford;

e. Roy Len Wofford.

They are eligible through their paternal lineage for various hereditary Societies.

Mrs. Reece has devoted her life to philanthropic work and has held responsible positions in the First Methodist Church, of which she has been a member for more than thirty years. She is also active in the following: Creative Writers Guild: Ladies' Oriental Shrine of North America, El Kantara Court #70, Midland, Texas; Order of Eastern Star #447, Odessa; American Natural History Association; Odessa Civic Music Association; Federated Grandmothers Club of America, #208; and holds life membership in Nathaniel Davis Chapter of Daughters of The American Revolution; (Chairman of National Defense); Daughters of Union Veterans, Orilla Shearer Tent, #14, Houston; National Society of New England Women (State Chairman); The National Society Magna Charta Dames (Colony Regent and Vice Regent of the State of Texas); Society of Descendants of Knights of The Garter; Colonial Order of The Crown; Sovereign Colonial Society Americans of Royal Descent; The Plantagenet Society; and the Order of Washington. Through her ancestor Nicholas Campe II, she is a newly enrolled member of the Colonial Dames of America, Chapter VIII.

(a) Ralph Carter Dodson (no issue) a retired automobile dealer in Kansas City, and

(b) MILDRED ANN DODSON, No. *1 below, who married Albert Blazier Seitz, Jr., during her early college career at Ohio State University, and they have three children:

(1) Albert Blazier Seitz, 3d, a graduate of Ohio State University (Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity) who served in the Navy in World War II and now lives in Florida with his wife, a son and a daughter, Melinda Ann.

(2) Sally Ann Seitz, who married Edward Ramsey, an Army Officer now stationed at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas. They have a son Edward and a daughter Sylvia Ann. Mrs. Ramsey is an hereditary member of The National Society Magna Charta Dames.

(3) Robb Leigh Seitz, an hereditary member of the Colonial Order of the Crown, a graduate of Ohio State University, having transferred from Ohio Wesleyan University (Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity) and a Lieutenant in the Ohio National Guard.

Colonel Albert Blazier Seitz, Jr., attended West Point, after preparatory school at Cornwall-on-the-Hudson and two years at Wittenberg College. He also attended the University of Virginia and Columbia University, and is a member of Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity. He, as well as both sons, is a member of Sons of the American Revolution.

During World War II, while with OSS, he was parachuted into Yugoslavia and became liaison officer with General Mihailovich and later with Tito, about which experiences he has had a book published. Decorated by our Army, King Peter of Yugoslavia also recognized Colonel Seitz' work and conferred on him the "Order of the White Eagle" with swords, which makes him a Knight of Serbia. He is listed in Who's Who in Ohio and Who's Who in America.

While Albert, 3d, served in our Navy during World War II, Sally and Robb lived with their parents at various posts, receiving the greater part of their education in Roumania, Greece and Germany. On returning to America, Sally Ann completed her education at Ohio State University, receiving both her Bachelor's and Master's Degrees and becoming a member of Kappa Kappa Gamma Sorority. Meanwhile Albert, 3d, discharged from the Navy, also was graduated from the same University.

Called back to Columbus from Greece in 1948 by the death of her mother, and again in 1949 by the beginning of the fatal illness of her father,

*1. MILDRED ANN DODSON SEITZ, (b) above, assumed the management of her father's lumber business and at his death became sole owner. She is the only woman member of the Railway Tie Association, and as far as is known is the only woman Railroad Tie dealer in the country. She was a member of the Committee on National Affairs in the Tie Association, until joining her husband in Laos in 1958, where he was stationed for two years. She has always been active in organizational work, both here and abroad. With PTA presidencies of three schools as a background, she organized and established a Teen Canteen in Berlin for the American Dependents under the direction of General Cornelius Ryan, beside having worked with displaced children in both Greece and Roumania. On her return to the United States she lectured throughout Ohio. She is immediate Past President of Watch Washington, an Ohio Republican Woman's Organization; and presently Treasurer of the Columbus Branch of the National League of American Pen Women. Mrs. Seitz is also listed in Who's Who in Ohio, a member of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and a life member of The National Society Magna Charta Dames, Colonial Order of the Crown, the Society of Descendants of Knights of the Garter, Sovereign Colonial Society Americans of Royal Descent and The Plantagenet Society. At the moment she is collaborating with her husband on a book concerning guerrilla activities during the Civil War. She is lecturing on Laos and compiling material on that little-known country, preparatory to a series of articles.

*7. Mary Isham Randolph, born 1718, died 1772, married in 1733 the Reverend James Keith, who was born in Scotland in 1696 and died in Prince William County, Virginia, in 1758.

The Keith family of Virginia descend from the Mareschals of the Scottish Army under Bruce. George Keith, born at Kincardine, Scotland, in 1685, who died near Potsdam, Prussia, 25 May 1778, was the 10th and last Earl to bear the name. His family had long been Mareschals of Scotland and were in possession of large estates. The family were adherents of the Stuarts and took an active part in the Rebellion in 1715, in favor of the Pretender. Alexander and James Keith, afterward Field Marshals of Russia and Prussia, were younger brothers of the Earl.

James Keith I was a Professor in the Marschal College at Aberdeen, Scotland. He was also a Bishop of the Episcopal Church and the uncle and guardian of the Earl and his brothers. His grandson James II (the Parson) had been educated with his cousins and, in 1715, was nineteen years of age. The Earl and his brothers took part in the Rebellion and were forced to escape to the Continent. Here, with the help of their cousin James at home, they continued to incite discontent and, in 1719, reentered Scotland but were repulsed. When the part which their cousin James Keith II had taken was discovered, he took refuge in the Colony of Virginia. He later returned to England to be ordained a Minister in the Church of England. He was Pastor of Old St. John's Church, Henrico County, Virginia, where Patrick Henry made his famous speech. He also ministered in Hamilton Parish, Fauquier County. Their second son was *6. John Keith of Fauquier County, born 1735, died intestate 1809. He served in the War for Independence in Colonel Coxe's Regiment of Militia in Jefferson County, Virginia, and also furnished supplies for the Army. He married in 1755 Mary Elizabeth Doniphan, sister of "Old Doctor Doniphan," and daughter of Joseph Doniphan; and their ten children are listed as follows in Fauquier County records, Bill in Suit, 24 July 1834: (1) Alexander; (2) Anderson; (3) George; (4) Joseph; (5) Judith; (6) Elizabeth; (7) Susan; (8) Peyton Randolph (No. *5 below); (9) Thomas R.; and (10) Doniphan.

The 1790 Census includes the names of James and John Keith, and it is said that they were the only persons of the name listed in Virginia at that time.

*5. Peyton Randolph Keith, No. 8 above, born in Fauquier County, Virginia, 20 June 1778, died at Amherst County, Virginia, 13 October 1842, married 18 May 1803 Sarah Lucy Petty, who was born in Orange County, Virginia, and died 3 October 1865.

> "Duncan is in his grave;
> After life's fitful fever, he sleeps well;
> Nor steel, nor poison, malice domestic,
> foreign levy,
> Nothing can touch him further."

28. MALCOLM III, King of Scotland, called Canmore because of the large size of his head, born 1031, died 1093. In 1068 he married second Princess Margaret, daughter of Edward the Exile, King of England, a descendant of KING ALFRED THE GREAT.

27. DAVID I, King of Scotland, born 1080, died at Carlisle 24 May 1153, a wise and just king, married 1113 (27) Matilda of Northumberland, died 1131, who was descended as follows:

oOo

90. AEDD MAWR, a Druid King of Britain more than 3000 years ago. His son

89. Brydain was father of

88. Annyn Tro, who married and had

87. Selys Hen (the Aged) whose line continues as follows:

56. BRAN, King of Siluria, was commander of the British fleet. In the year A. D. 36, he resigned the crown to his son Caradoc and became Arch-Druid of the college of Siluria, where he remained some years until called upon to be a hostage for his son. During his seven years in Rome, he became the first royal convert to Christianity, and was baptized, it is said, by the Apostle Paul, as was his son Caradoc and the latter's two sons, King Cyllinus and Cynon. He is known as "Bran the Blessed Sovereign," as "he was the first to bring the faith of Christ to the Cymry." His recorded proverb is: "There is no good apart from God." He introduced the use of vellum into Britain. His son

55. CARADOC (Caractacus) "one of nature's noblemen," was King of Saluria (Monmouthshire, etc.) where he died. He was born at Trevan, Llanilid, in Glamorganshire. His valiant services to his country in connection with the attempted invasions of the island are well known.

54. Cyllin (Cyllinus) King of Saluria, was sainted by the early Church of Britain. "He first of the Cymry gave infants names, for before names were not given except to adults, and then from something characteristic in their bodies, minds or manner."

53. Prince Coel, son of Cyllin, King of Siluria. In his day, about the year 170, Iranaeus wrote: "Christianity has been propagated among the Germans and the Britons."

52. LLEUVER MAWR (The Great Light, or Lucius the Great) was the second Blessed Sovereign (Cadwalader was the third). King of Britain, he was baptized at Winchester by his father's first cousin, the younger St. Timothy, who suffered martyrdom at age 90 on 22

August A. D. 139. In A. D. 170 Lucius succeeded to the throne of Britain and became the first Christian king in all the world. He built the Cathedral at Llandaff, the first Christian sanctuary in Britain, and changed the established religion of Britain from Druidism to Christianity.

48. CONSTANTINE THE GREAT (Flavius Valerius Aurelius Constantinus) born 265, died in May, A. D. 337, buried in the church of the Holy Apostles in Constantinople. Of British Birth and education, he is known as the first Christian Emperor. With a British army he set out to put an end to the persecution of Christians forever. The greatest of all Roman Emperors, he annexed Britain to the Roman Empire and founded Constantinople. In the year 321 he decreed that the Christian Sunday be truly observed as a day of rest, a wonderful boon to the toiling serfs.

47. Constantius II, Emperor, who died 360. He married second Faustina, conferred upon her the title of Augusta and by her had Constantia, wife of the Emperor Gratian (367-383) and her sister

46. Theodora, the mother of

45. Constantius III, the commander-in-chief of the Emperor Honorius' forces, who was later proclaimed Emperor, reigned only seven months and died in 421. In the year 410 the Roman army left Britain, never to return. About the year 432 Saint Patrick, a Scot named Succat, who had been a British slave, kidnapped by the Irish, escaped and later made his way back to Ireland as a missionary of the Gospel. With trumpet and drum he drew the people to him and is said to have won the entire Island. About a century later Saint Columba carried the gospel to Scotland and founded the Scottish church. Later Saint Boniface of Devonshire, England, carried the gospel to Germany and was there slain in A. D. 755. No land has ever received the gospel except it was brought there by some foreign missionary.

Constantius married Galla Placidia, widow of Athaulf.

44. Valentinian III, Emperor of the West 425-455, married Eudoxia.

43. Eudoxia the Younger. She married (43) HUNERIC, King of the Vandals, who died in Africa 480. In his lifetime, Cerdic of England was born.

42. HILDERIC (a contemporary of the British King Arthur) was King of the Vandals in Africa. He died 530, having married Amfleda the Younger.

41. Hilda, Princess of the Goths. She married FRODE VII, King of Denmark, died 548.

He was sixth in descent from Walter Stevens and his wife Ann Hearle and ninth in descent from Thomas Libby and his wife Jane Pomeroy, all of co. Cornwall, England.

Henry Stevens, the father of Walter Crawford Stevens, came to America in 1831 and became a lumberman and manufacturer of clay products on his large holdings in Greene and Baldwin Counties, Georgia. On 26 January 1839 he married Matilda, daughter of John Stephens and Martha his wife, of Wake County, North Carolina.

During the War between the States his Company supplied the Confederate Government with many sorely needed articles. As a consequence of this the plant was completely destroyed by Sherman on his march through Georgia. Henry Stevens was a Master Mason and a Methodist. His eldest son,

Walter Crawford Stevens, was educated at Emory College at Oxford, Georgia, where he was a member of the Few Literary Society. At the age of 17 he enlisted in the Confederate Army, in the 27th Georgia Battalion, for the duration. After the close of active hostilities he returned to Baldwin County and formed a partnership with his brother, John Henry, and uncle, William Stevens, late of England, for the manufacture of clay products, a pioneer in this business in the South. He was also a promoter and the first president of the Citizens National Bank in Macon, Georgia. He founded the H. Stevens Sons Company for the manufacture of clay products in Macon, Georgia, and the Oconee Brick and Tile Company of Milledgeville, Georgia. He was a philanthropist, a Methodist and a Democrat. Their daughter,

*1. MARIE STEVENS, was born 9 Steptember 1883 at the home of her maternal grandparents, Wilson Lumpkin Davis and his wife Mary Wright, in Newton County, Georgia. She attended the Lucy Cobb Institute in Athens, Georgia, continuing her education traveling in Europe for nine months. She was in London for the Coronation of King Edward VII, and was presented, in audience, to Pope XIII in Rome. On her return from Europe she made her debut in Macon Society. Two years later, 7 November 1905, she married Billington Sanders Walker, III, born at Monroe, Georgia, 3 April 1883, died 22 May 1913, and they had a son, Billington Sanders Walker, IV. The royal and baronial ancestry of the Walker family is recorded later in this Chapter.

Marie Stevens (Mrs. Walker) married second at the Church of the Transfiguration in New York City, 7 July 1929, William Thomas Wood, II, who was born at Sanford, Florida, 11 October 1889, died 30 April 1959.
